CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-NINTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

to discontinue or in any respect affect the supervisory authority of the Secretary of the Interior relative to any mineral lease or mineral leases heretofore executed by any allottee of said tribe.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know if an amendment to the pending proposition would be in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not in order now, but the Chair will recognize the Senator to offer his amendment after the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask now that the bill be reported to the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and still open to amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have a couple of short amendments which relate to the removal of restrictions in individual cases, and I will offer them now, to come in at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 91, after line 7, insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a fee-simple patent to Demas Eastman, a Santee Sioux allottee, No. 837, and the issuance of said patent shall operate as a removal of all restrictions as to the sale, incumbrance, or taxation of the land so patented.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I offer another amendment of the same character.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 151, after line 15, insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cancel the certificate of patent No. 426, issued to Charley Adass on December 11, 1891, for lot 11, section 6; lots 11, 13, and the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section 5, township 38 north, range 5 east, west meridian, Olympia land district, State of Washington, and issue in lieu thereof a patent in fee simple to his widow and heirs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONG. I offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 91 insert after the amendment just agreed to:

That the restrictions upon the alienation of Manda Proctor, deceased, a Creek Indian, for 26.39 acres, it being the west half of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter, section 12, township 7, north of range 8, 26.39 acres.

Mr. TILLMAN. I think there should be an explanation of the allottee named. He is a full blood, I judge, and there must be an oil well or something on that 26 acres or there would not be any necessity to have some special Indian allotment excepted from the general rule.

Mr. CLAPP. I raise the point of order on that amendment. I think the amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. LONG. This is adjoining the town of Holdenville, in the Indian Territory.

Mr. CLAPP (to Mr. TILLMAN). Does the Senator want to debate it?

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I am not going to debate it. The Senator has made a point of order against it.

Mr. CLAPP. I withdraw the point if it is not going to be debated, and will let the amendment be voted on.

Mr. TILLMAN. I simply want to know what explanation there is as to why this particular allottee by name should be exempted from the general provision, which we just now incorporated.

Mr. LONG. If the general provision that we have incorporated becomes a law it will apply to this allottee.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is he a white Indian?

Mr. LONG. No; a mixed blood.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then why put it in?

Mr. LONG. The other provision may not be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is already incorporated in the bill—that is, we have agreed to it.

Mr. LONG. It may not become a law.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want them all to fare alike. I do not believe there ought to be any discrimination by name in that way, and I object to it, just as I have objection to another discrimination here on account of color.

Mr. CLAPP. I raise the point of order against the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CLAPP. I ask to have the bill reported to the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be added after line 21, page 162.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert, after line 21, page 162, and after the amendment already adopted, inserted at the same place, the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to pay, in his discretion, on the order of the business committee of the Menominee tribe of Indians, on the Menominee Indian Reservation, in the State of Wisconsin, the indebtedness of said committee and its councils, incurred by said committee in the transaction of tribal business, to be taken from any of the funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians as a tribe, and said committee shall file annual account with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to inquire if that amendment has been reported by the committee.

Mr. CLAPP. No, sir; it has not been reported by the committee.

Mr. LODGE. It does not seem to me, Mr. President, that we ought to insert a provision for a payment of that kind which has never been investigated by a committee. I make the point of order on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may be permitted, I should like to make a statement with respect to the amendment, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts will then not insist on the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, certainly. I withdraw the point of order to permit the Senator to do that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this proposition follows properly an amendment which has already been adopted to provide for the disposition of certain down and dead timber on the Menominee Indian Reservation. A committee known as the "business committee" of that tribe of Indians, in looking after the interests of the tribe with respect to their timber lands, have incurred certain expenses and advanced some money for the benefit of the Indians as a whole. It will be noticed that the amendment leaves it entirely within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior as to whether any claim which this business committee may present shall be paid. It seems to me very clear that the Secretary will have better opportunity to investigate the validity of such claim than any committee of the Senate. It ought to be perfectly safe to leave this matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior when he is invested with full discretion with reference to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the claim be a proper one, I certainly should not interfere with it in any way or desire to do so; but my objection is that it has never been investigated by anybody; that there is no estimate sent here for it from the Department; and that no investigation has been made by the committee. It seems to me that as to payment of money in that way, before the Senate passes it, it should have some knowledge in regard to the amount involved, and not leave it entirely as a matter of discretion in any Department. I think, therefore, that I shall have to insist on my point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have here a rather long letter, which I do not wish to read, from D. C. McCurtain, Choctaw delegate, protesting against the amendment beginning at the top of page 36, which I will read in order that his protest may be understood:

That all Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen whose names appear upon the rolls of said tribes as approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall each have the preference right to purchase, at a valuation to be ascertained by appraisement to be hereafter made under rules and regulations prescribed by said Secretary, 80 acres of the unallotted lands of said tribes.

Mr. McCurtain objects to this discrimination as against all the other Indians, and this letter explains his objection; but the chairman of the committee has agreed that, so far as he is concerned about the Senate amendment, he is willing that there shall be a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was adopted in order that it may be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate reconsider the vote by which it adopted the committee provision at the top of page 36, which he has just read.

Mr. HALE (to Mr. TILLMAN). Ask that the Senate disagree to the amendment when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, Mr. President, I hope the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment made on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], on which the Senator from Wisconsin desires to have a separate vote, will be reserved. Is it desired that any other amendment be reserved? If not, all the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be regarded as concurred in.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the following amendment, to come in at an appropriate place after the amendment heretofore adopted:

And provided further, That such sales shall be made, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, by advertising the same and receiving sealed bids therefor.

Mr. WARNER. Let me make a suggestion. The Senate has just removed the restrictions from the Indian allottees, excepting as to full bloods and minors. By this amendment the restrictions are replaced. I think the Senator from Wisconsin would hardly want those words added to the amendment, as they nullify the action which the Senate has just taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not so understand it, Mr. President. I believe it places a reasonable restriction upon the sale or alienation of these lands.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to hear the amendment read at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to have it read as it will read if the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] be added.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to have the whole paragraph read, so that we can see the connection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The Secretary read as follows:

That all restrictions upon the alienation of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, except Indians of full blood and Indians under 21 years of age, are, except as to homesteads, hereby removed, to take effect July 1, 1906: Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be held or construed to discontinue or in any respect affect the supervisory authority of the Secretary of the Interior relative to any mineral lands or mineral leases heretofore executed by any allottee of said tribe: And provided further, That such sale shall be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior by advertising the same and receiving sealed bids therefor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am unable to see that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin destroys the general amendment adopted by the Senate. It limits the provision to mineral lands, as I understand it.

Mr. WARNER. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not mean the restriction; I mean the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. The amendment which he proposes to add there refers to mineral lands.

Mr. WARNER. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he will find it does not refer to mineral lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the provision as it will read if amended.

The Secretary again read the provision heretofore adopted, together with the amendment of Mr. LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, that seems to me, I confess, again on hearing it read, to relate to mineral lands.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The first provision relates to mineral lands and the latter proviso relates to all lands.

Mr. BAILEY. The first provision relates to mineral lands or mineral leases, and the last provision relates to sales. It expressly uses the words "such sales."

Mr. LODGE. I thought it referred to mineral land. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] can state.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My purpose was to have all sales——

Mr. LODGE. All sales?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; to have all sales take place under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior upon sealed bids. The Secretary of the Interior recites in his report that wherever sales have been made in any other manner very much less than the value of the land has been received, and it seems to me that if these lands are to be sold this is a wise provision to attach to the sale. We surely ought to endeavor to realize the fair value of these lands for the benefit of the Indians whenever they are sold.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will not insist on this amendment. Probably when he has become more familiar with conditions in the Indian Territory he will attach less importance to what the Secretary of the Interior says about it.

I confess, Mr. President, that I have greater interest in the white people of that Territory than I have in the Indians, because the white people outnumber the Indians something like ten to one. I know, besides, that the future of that country depends upon the white people there more than upon the Indians. I know, also, that as you render the land of that country inalienable, you not only retard its progress, but you reduce the people, who must make it great, to the condition of tenants instead of home owners.

It is a happy circumstance that in the nature of things it will be forever impossible for the land of that Territory—soon, I hope, to become a State—to be concentrated in large bodies in the hands of any one man or in the hands of any one interest, or, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] says, in the hands of any corporation.

I venture to say that under this amendment it will soon come to pass that more men in the Indian Territory will cultivate their own farms and fewer men cultivate the farms of landlords than in any other State of this Union.

The tracts of land made marketable by this amendment are not such as to tempt the avarice of those who are looking for great transactions with large profits, because what the Indian can sell under this liberalization of the law is only what makes a moderate holding for a self-respecting American farmer.

If I could have had my way, I would have provided that the lands should be sold not to anybody but to the tenants who now occupy them, and at a price which should be a fair appraisal of their value; but I recognize that the Indian owns the land, and is therefore entitled to obtain the highest market price for it.

Our experience is that it has never been possible to obtain anything like a fair value for any property in the Indian Territory under any system of appraisement, and for that reason it has seemed to me that, in order for the Indian to realize the highest price obtainable for his land, he should be permitted to sell it in the open market under competitive conditions. At last, however, when the Indian comes to sell from 80 to 160 acres, he will find only the purchaser who wants to make it a homestead and devote it to the uses of agriculture.

It signifies vastly more to the future welfare of that country that they should now be permitted to make homes of that land than that they should be postponed for many years until the gradual, but constant, increase in value will put even the moderate acreage of 160 beyond the purchasing power of the average farmer there. I therefore believe that the American Congress can do no service so valuable to that new country as to let the people who have gone there to make it with their brain, their muscle, and their industry a great Commonwealth, as to give them an opportunity to come into the possession of this land.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I fully agree with the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] as to the necessity for a provision removing the restrictions from the mixed bloods of the Five Civilized Tribes. I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], for it nullifies the amendment which has been adopted. Providing that sales can only be made on sealed bids, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, places greater restrictions on the disposal of lands in the Indian Territory than exist now. Under existing law restrictions can be removed by the Secretary of the Interior after an investigation on the merits of each particular case.

The objection to the present law is that it is impossible for the Secretary to investigate these cases and dispose of them. I call the attention of the Senate to the record made last year under existing law. During the last fiscal year there were 2,245 applications made for the removal of restrictions. Of this number 388 were recommended for approval by the Indian agent in the Indian Territory and 982 for disapproval, leaving the remainder unacted upon at the end of the fiscal year. The amendment that has been adopted removes the restrictions, except as to minors and except as to full bloods.

This is not a new question at this session of Congress. In the bill providing for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes the following provision was passed by the House of Representatives:

That all the restrictions upon the alienation and leasing of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes, except Indians of full blood and except minors, are, except as to "homesteads," hereby removed.

That provision passed the House of Representatives. It was reported to the Senate with but slight modification by the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was stricken out in the Senate, but the Senate adopted this provision, very similar in its terms:

That all restrictions upon alienations and leasing of lands of Indian allottees of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole tribes of less than full blood are, except as to homesteads, hereby removed.

This was practically the same as that contained in the amendment now pending.

A provision was agreed to in the conference practically identical with this, and it was reported to the Senate. Objection was made to a certain part of that report. The report was withdrawn and a second report was made, leaving out this provision. So that this provision substantially has passed the Senate and the House of Representatives at this sesion of Congress. I believe that the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin should be rejected and that the provision which was adopted by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole should be agreed to in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator understands that the point of order made in the Senate now against the provision adopted as in Committee of the Whole is just as good as it was in Committee of the Whole; and if this discussion is to proceed and that amendment is to be changed and modified I shall make the point of order against the original amendment.

Mr. LONG. I hope we may have a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask the Senator from Kansas whether or not it is a fact that this same provision, as it appeared in the House bill and as it passed the House and substantially as it passed the Senate, was not prepared by and received the sanction of the Interior Department?

Mr. LONG. I so understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In justification of the amendment which I have proposed, I wish to read from the report of the Secretary of the Interior. Referring to the sale of lands by this method, the Secretary says:

> This method of selling Indian lands is most satisfactory from a departmental standpoint, having in view the best interests of the allottee. It does not so well meet the approval of the prospective purchaser. It requires him to bid against any and all who desire to compete for the same land, and also makes it necessary for him to bid above the amount of an unknown Government appraisement. The records show that by the present method of sale of land by sealed bids lands have been sold for a much higher price than by previous private sales, which were disapproved by the Department.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word with reference to the date of the proposed sale of these lands. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] fixes July 1 as the date of such sale. At that time farmers are occupied with their crops and would not be free to look after the purchase of lands. It is the busy season for the cotton raiser and the grain grower. I have had many letters from farmers in the Indian Territory urging if the lands are to be sold that the date of such sale be fixed as late as September or October, giving them an equal opportunity with the land speculators to be present when the lands are offered for sale. If in order, when the proposition now under discussion is disposed of I shall offer an amendment changing the date when these sales are to take place.

I am in accord with what the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] has said about this Territory. It will be retarded in its development if these lands can not be sold, the country opened up, and the lands made productive. The amendment which I have offered does not propose to postpone the sale of the lands. It simply provides that the owners of these lands shall receive the highest prices possible for them whenever they are sold.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have read this amendment and the amendment proposed to it. There is such a diversity of opinion in the Senate as to the policy which ought to be pursued on this subject that I am constrained to think that it would be better if the Senate did not undertake permanently to solve it to-day. I think in all human probability next winter the Congress will assemble again, and in the meantime, if another body does its duty, as I view it, Oklahoma will come into the Union as a State. We can then take the requisite time to discuss this matter from every possible standpoint and arrive at a conclusion which will alike be honorable to the Government of the United States and in the interest of the Indians. I feel it to be my duty, all things considered, to renew the point of order which I made but withheld.

Mr. WARNER. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. The same reasons given for delay now for another Congress to further investigate this matter were the identical reasons that were given in 1893, when the Dawes Commission was formed so as to enable the various tribes to become civilized, and that is thirteen years ago.

Mr. SPOONER. This is not thirteen years.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to make this suggestion to the Senator from Wisconsin before he insists upon that point of order: If these people could have been permitted to sell, and the people who have gone into that country could have been permitted to buy these lands ten years ago, there was no man of industry, even without capital, who could not have bought them and paid for them and been the owner of an American farm to-day. The increase in value has been very great in that country, and if we wait until it becomes a State, with the stimulation of all enterprise and the enhancement of all values that will inevitably follow statehood, it is true we will get the Indians more for their land, but we will make it more difficult for an American citizen with a white skin to buy a home. I make no concealment; I repeat it for the second, and I would repeat it for the thirty-second time, that I am vastly more interested in the white man than I am in the Indian, because, as I said—the Senator from Wisconsin was not here a moment ago when I said it—there are so many more white men there whose interests are to be consulted than there are Indians.

If the sale of these lands is to be postponed and this increase in value is to go on, it is as certain as that we live that the lands will reach a purchase price where a man can not buy them and hope to pay for them out of the profits of his farm, and they must pass into the hands of men who buy them because they have money to invest, and who will hold them for the purpose of renting them.

I want to see as many home owners and as few tenants there as possible, and I regret sincerely that those people were not able to buy land five years ago when they could have bought it for 20 per cent of its present value. I apprehend that in the course of another twelve months or two years the enhancement in value will be so great as enormously to diminish the num- of people who will be able to buy those lands for the purpose of making them their homes. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist upon postponing nearly a million of American citizens in the opportunity to get an excellent, and, at present prices, a reasonably cheap farm.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the observations of the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] confirm me in the wisdom of delay. The fact that the Indian is in so great a minority relatively to the white man and that the white man alone makes the laws which involve the rights of the Indian ought to lead the Senate of the United States for once to think mainly of the Indian.

I am very glad, from the standpoint of the interest of the Indian, that these lands were not sold five years ago, so that they could have been acquired from the Indian by the white man at a much less price than they can be acquired to-day. It is no argument against the delay which my point of order involves that a year from now the Indian will be able to obtain a better price for his land than he would be able to obtain for it to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to remind him that except for the white men who have gone there to build up that country the land would hardly be worth 50 cents an acre to-day?

Mr. SPOONER. Very likely.

Mr. BAILEY. And it does look a little hard——

Mr. LODGE. They did not go there for philanthropic purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests that they did not go there for philanthropic reasons. That is true, but it is not more true than it is that men do not fish along the coast of New England for philanthropic reasons.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not.

Mr. BAILEY. Men go everywhere in this world to better their condition or to entertain their time and to promote their pleasure. I rejoice to say that the people in the Indian Territory have no waste time to entertain, and they are too busy trying to provide for their future generations to have much time for promoting their pleasure. They went there, I grant, for the purpose of improving their condition, and I am pleading with the Senate not to make it harder for them to accomplish that laudable purpose.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to see the Indian get all he can get for his land. He can not utilize it as the white man can, and he must rely upon the proceeds of its sale and the income derived from the proceeds of its sale.

The Indian race is a vanishing race. It will not be long until every acre of land in Oklahoma will be occupied by a white man. I have a picture at my house which beautifully, but pathetically, illustrates the decay of the Indian race. Two Indians appear in the picture, hardly discernible, riding their ponies in the deep twilight to the West. As a Government we have betrayed them into the hands of the white man. What is left of their ancient patrimony I think this Government ought, as far as it may, to conserve.

The whole basis of this amendment is that the Indian, at least the half-breed, is able to take care of his own business interests. So be it. As to the majority that is true. As to the large minority confessedly it is not true. If we delay yet a little while until another session of the Congress, the Senator from Texas thinks the lands of the Indians will have appreciated in value. Is that, from the standpoint of the traditional guardian of the Indian—the Government of the United States—an objection to delay?

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not. But if you hold the land until it is worth $100 an acre, as to many of these Indians it will be no profit to them. As to the others——

Mr. SPOONER. Did the Senator say as to most of them?

Mr. BAILEY. As to many——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh.

Mr. BAILEY. It will be no profit to them. Whatever they get out of it and whenever they get it, it will go. As to those who would profit at any time, they are quite capable of taking care of themselves now; and some of these very Indians in whose behalf the Senator from Wisconsin speaks so beautifully would be buying out their brother Indians, because they are thrifty enough to take care of themselves in any trade.

But my view is this: In trying to perform the duty of fully protecting the Indians you are imposing a great hardship upon the white man. Mr. President, it touches me deeply when Senators talk about this vanishing race. That is a beautiful sentiment, but I must be permitted to say it is not practical statesmanship.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not politics.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I would not accuse the Senator from Wisconsin of being a politician.

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. BAILEY. He is a statesman. It is not practical statesmanship to try to preserve for those who can not keep and thus withhold from those who would make great advantage of it if they could obtain it now.

Mr. SPOONER. The argument of the Senator is the justification by the white man of the policy of the white man toward the Indian from the beginning.

Mr. BAILEY. No, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. From the beginning.

Mr. BAILEY. Let the Senator better understand me. I do not justify it.

Mr. SPOONER. I said the argument justified it.

Mr. BAILEY. No; I would even dissent from that statement. I am recognizing, to borrow a famous phrase, "a condition and not a theory."

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has at heart, apparently, in this question the interest of the white man and not the interest of the Indian. Is there nobody in the United States whose duty it is to have at heart the interest of the Indian? If there be a body in the United States whose duty it is to have at heart the interest of the Indian, that is the Congress of the United States, including this body.

I have been importuned by many men from different States during the pendency of this bill not to object to the proposition to remove generally all restrictions upon alienation of Indian lands in the Indian Territory. I have not been importuned, Mr. President, by any Indian, except one by telegraph, or by anyone who claimed to speak for the Indians, save one who, I thought, spoke more infinitely for the white man than he did for the Indian.

The Senator spoke of the land becoming so high in price that the white man will not buy it, if I understood him correctly.

Mr. BAILEY. The white man who would work it can not buy it if it advances much beyond its present price.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, Mr. President, if it becomes so high in price that only the rich can buy it, should not the Indian have the benefit of that enhancement in price? There is no justification for urging that we should so legislate as to bring about an environment in which the Indian this year must sell his land for a lower price than he would sell it next year, except the proposition of the Senator, that no matter what the price is it would be of no benefit to the Indian, for he could not properly utilize it. That is only an added reason why we should take greater care of the interest of the Indian.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Indian does not have to sell his land unless he chooses to do so. He can hold it if he wishes.

Mr. SPOONER. "The Indian does not have to sell his land unless he chooses to do so." But from the beginning the Indian has been beguiled in one way and another into selling his land, sometimes through the inspiration of fire water, sometimes in another way, and again in another. Every man knows that from the beginning he has been the prey of the white man, and he will continue to be. No matter what the law is, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] said a little while ago, whether the Indian is authorized by law to sell his land or not, it will be occupied by a white man. He will get it in one way or another. But the Indian is not remediless if his title does not pass.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Sympathizing with the Senator's plea for justice to and humane treatment of the Indians, I wish to ask him whether or not the delay in the transfer does not becloud the title somewhat and give opportunity for any man who is seeking to purchase an Indian's land to get from him his obligation to sell? I was in that country four or five years ago, and I was told by a prominent lawyer that in all his dealings—and he had been in the Territory fifteen years—he had never known an Indian to break his word. Under the condition which the Senator is seeking to perpetuate, an Indian enters into an agreement with some tenant to sell his land as soon as he can, and the price is already fixed, and the Senator is only bearing down and destroying the value of the land and making the Indian get less than he otherwise would.

I think the Senator from Texas is in error in regard to the increase in value. The actual value will increase, but the contract already made by the Indian will, as a matter of fact, result in the Indian getting less for the land than he would if he were free to sell.

Mr. BAILEY. The mistake of the Senator from South Carolina is that it is not the tenant who as a rule makes the bargain. It is a speculator who makes the bargain, and then he——

Mr. TILLMAN. Some of the merchants have roped in the Indian trade and have obtained the Indian's confidence in one way or another, like the instance the other day involving a man named Brown, of whom the Senator from Wisconsin has heard. I will say, by the way, that that man Brown, out of $153,000 which he received, paid himself as participant or partner in a company and a lawyer $103,000 and the Indians got $50,000.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; that is the old story.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the way it will go in spite of all the Senator from Wisconsin can do.

Mr. SPOONER. Then why not remove all restrictions?

Mr. TILLMAN. I am willing to do it right now.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not.

If the Indian as a race in the Indian Territory is so much better than the white man as a race that he never breaks his word, I think we ought to take care of him.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator must remember that there are thousands of white men in the Indian Territory who would not break their word.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. But they are not the men who drive the hard bargains with the Indians. It is the conscienceless speculator.

Mr. SPOONER. They are not the men from whom the Indian needs protection. But if there is an Indian tract of land anywhere between the oceans which is worth having there will be hundreds of white men after it.

Mr. BAILEY. And they will get it.

Mr. SPOONER. Ready to swindle the Indian out of it.

Now, Mr. President, I want the Indian to get the highest price he can for his land. Does the Senator from Texas want him to?

Mr. BAILEY. If I thought he would keep it and make good use of it, yes. But since I know that the improvident ones will waste it, I prefer to see a thrifty, industrious, intelligent American farmer get a farm when he can buy it at a reasonable price rather than to see him compelled to wait until he can not buy it at all.

Mr. SPOONER. But the Senator ignores the relation in which this Government stands to the Indian.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. Has the Senator from Wisconsin visited the Indian Territory in recent years?

Mr. SPOONER. I have never visited it.

Mr. LONG. Then I suggest to the Senator that while he understands the Indian question in a general way, he should visit the Indian Territory. If he does, he will come away with the same opinion which the Senator from South Carolina has just stated to the Senate. Under existing conditions, which the Senator would perpetuate by not removing these restrictions, it is the man who makes a contract with the Indian, in which he agrees to have the Indian's restrictions removed, or acts for him in securing the removal, who gets the land for less than its value. The present system prevents the Indian from selling his land for its real value, as he would be able to do if the restrictions were removed.

I entirely agree with the Senator from South Carolina as to the conditions there. They would be very much improved by this amendment, and the existing conditions are injurious to the interests of the Indian.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt there is a very strong public sentiment in the States which border on the Indian Territory in favor of removing all restrictions upon Indian alienation.

Mr. LONG. Not only is there such a public sentiment there, but also among the Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Mr. SPOONER. Represented by the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LONG. Represented before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. By whom?

Mr. LONG. By Indians and by petitions and letters from these Indians.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, just one other phase of this question occurs to me which I want him to contemplate while he is going on, and that is this:

Some ten or twelve years ago—I do not exactly recall the date—the Indian lands in what is now known as "Oklahoma" were purchased by the United States Government and were thrown open to settlement at a fixed rate of $2 or $2.50 an acre, or something like that; perhaps $4; I do not recall the exact amount. But I know there was a terrific rush of white men from all parts of the country to get in and try to get a home at even that price, because arable land that gets water from the clouds has grown very scarce in this country, so far as settlement is concerned.

The settlers rushed in, and they got eighty or a hundred and sixty acres, whatever apportionment they could get hold of. Then, in a few years—three or four or five years—there came the most doleful, pitiful appeals to Congress that these people never would be able to pay for the land, and we, in our liberality and love for our own kind, gave them their homes. We just said: "Here, we will make you a present of your homes. Take them and go. We will give you a title." The Senator wants to have the white men who have gone into the eastern end of the Indian Territory pay ten, twenty, thirty, forty, and fifty dollars an acre, whereas the Government gave the other white men their land.

The land is all equally valuable. I have been near the arid lands in Oklahoma, and those lands produce magnificent wheat crops and alfalfa, and also cotton, which is a dry plant and likes sunshine. No one knows exactly where the border of the great American desert is. It is nearly on the western edge of Oklahoma.

But the Senator ought to recollect, in his solicitude for the Indians in the eastern end of the Territory, that the white men in the western end have been given their lands by the Government of the United States, and he ought not to make it so hard upon the others to buy from the Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. My solicitude is for the Indian, not for the Indian in the east end or the west end, but for the Indian.

Mr. TILLMAN. You ought to have some little solicitude for the white man in the eastern end, inasmuch as Congress has had such solicitude for the white man in the west.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Government is to buy the land from the Indians and give it to the white men, let the Government buy it and give it to the white man——

Mr. TILLMAN. That has not been proposed, however.

Mr. SPOONER. But let the Government buy it for an honest price.

Mr. TILLMAN. Surely.

Mr. SPOONER. Giving the Indian the appraised value of it, what it is really worth, and then this matter and all the points which the Senator from Texas makes can be easily adjusted. But that is not this proposition.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I want no misunderstanding of my position. I do not agree with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] that it is in the interest of the Indian to remove these restrictions. I seek the removal of them purely in the interest of the white man. I make no concealment of that. I do not mean to insinuate that the Senator from Kansas has any opinion which he conceals. Of course he believes what he says, and I support the amendment for a precisely opposite motive, and I want to say so frankly to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I so understood.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to add that I believe it is no hardship on the Indian to make him divide with the white man the enormous increase in the value of the land which has come with the advent of the white men.

Mr. SPOONER. In view of the fact that the white man has always been dividing with the Indian, of course the Indian ought to divide with the white man. That is reciprocity; and the Senator from Texas is in favor of reciprocity, I suppose.

Mr. President, the Senator from Texas is frank and manly about it. He—and he knows quite as much about it as the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] can know—concedes frankly that he speaks not for the interest of the Indian, but he speaks for the interest of the white man. There is some one always to speak for the interest of the white man. He can generally speak for his own interest. But it does not always happen that there is some one to speak for the interest of the Indian. When the Senator from Texas says—and he speaks in a manly way the truth about it—that this is not for the interest of the Indian, and he justifies his attitude upon the converse proposition that it is for the interest of the white man, what ought the Senate to do? Ought we to conserve the interest of the Indian in this Indian bill or ought we to be blind to the interest of the Indian, with wide-open eyes only to the interest of the white man? That brings it, like a common-law pleading, down to the point, and upon that point the Senate could well divide. There ought to be few on one side of it, from my standpoint, and many on the other.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will permit the Senate to divide on that proposition, and not insist upon his point of order.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Wisconsin has become more and more convinced that the interest of the Indian is to delay this legislation until he can get a higher price next year for his land.

Mr. LONG. And not permit the Senate to divide?

Mr. SPOONER. No, sir; I propose to make the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Will the Senator from Wisconsin withhold the point of order for just a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that I am of the opinion that the Indian for whom he is so solicitous is not the Indian concerned in this amendment. The Indian concerned in this amendment is the Indian who has been appealing to Congress time after time, year after year, to be allowed to become, as Congress by express legislation said he should become, a citizen of the United States. It is not the blanket Indian of the western plains; it is the Indian who lives in houses, who has his household implements, who has his home, who has his property, who has his boys and girls away at college, who comes to the Supreme Court and argues cases, who is concerned in this amendment. The full-blood Indian is expressly reserved.

Mr. LONG. And the Indian who is a citizen of the United States.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. And who is a citizen of the United States in all except being allowed to exercise the right of citizenship.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me inquire, is the mixed-blood Indian who comes to the Supreme Court of the United States and argues cases any more a citizen of the United States than the full-blood, who does not?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all, but he is better able to manage his own concerns. So this bill provides that he shall have the right to alienate his land, but the full blood shall still be kept from it.

The Senator says he has had but one letter or has not heard from any of the Indians upon this matter. I have had many interviews; I have had many letters; I have received many petitions from the Indians and but one from the whites. The Indians themselves are concerned in this matter, and the Indians themselves say that those who really wish to befriend them, many of them not understanding the circumstances, are in effect tying their hands.

Mr. President, in view of the situation and of the facts, I believe the Senate on this question ought to express its opinion upon the record. I suggest that the point of order might well be considered by the Chair under section 2 of Rule XX, which provides that "the Presiding Officer may submit any question of order for the decision of the Senate."

Mr. HALE. That applies only to relevancy things.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a question of relevancy.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. "Any question of order."

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon, only as to relevancy.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to one fact that appeared in the testimony. Yesterday, when we had a committee meeting, I asked Mr. Owen, who was representing the Indians, to give me the average quantum of Indian blood in those known as mixed bloods, and he stated that it was from an eighth to a sixteenth; that the great number of them were above that; that there were very few of what you might call "half bloods" now; that even the half or the quarter bloods are almost unknown. So I consider that we are treating practically with white men rather than Indians.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there is a pressure for this proposition outside of this Chamber which is not at all persuasive upon me in its favor. Under existing law I understand that the Secretary of the Interior may remove restrictions upon alienation in all cases where it is made to appear to him that in justice to the applicant it should be done. If the Senator from Colorado is right, that Congress has no jurisdiction whatever over this subject, it is very easy to raise that question.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, I have never said that Congress did not have jurisdiction over the real property the Indians have taken subject to certain restrictions and limitations. Of course we control that, because the control remains in the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Now, Mr. President, every appeal which has been made to me has been based upon one of two grounds. A gentleman came to me from the State of Wisconsin who represents capitalists in the State who were making investments and loaning money in the Indian Territory, and he was extremely anxious, representing them, that all restrictions upon the power of alienation should be removed. I said to him, "I can readily understand your position and the motive which inspires it, but bring me something from the Indian with whom you want to deal." Others have come claiming that if these restrictions were not removed there would be a large amount of property in the Indian Territory exempt from taxation. Well, what of it?

I do not want to retard the growth of Oklahoma. I hope with all my heart that before this session adjourns she will become a State in the Union. Mr. President, if she does not it will be impossible of explanation upon any theory of justice.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. LONG. Does the Senator think it is to the interest of the future State of Oklahoma, and fair to the present Territory of Oklahoma, that there should be a large amount of real estate in the Indian Territory not subject to taxation?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that is reducing this question to a very low plane.

Mr. LONG. It is only one of the points in this controversy.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. One at a time.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the Senator from Kansas if he thinks it is right to keep Oklahoma out of the Union until New Mexico and Arizona are brought in?

Mr. LONG. I presume that question will be presented to the Senate for consideration in the near future.

Mr. BAILEY. How will the Senator from Kansas vote on that proposition?

Mr. LONG. I will then announce my position by my vote.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I intend to occupy three minutes, and then invoke the judicial power of the Vice-President.

I want to see Oklahoma come into the Union. She will make a magnificent State. Her resources are boundless in climate, soil, and variety. Her population already is very, very great compared with the population of Territories heretofore admitted into the Union as States. Her population, I believe, is a population of broad-minded, just, generous, patriotic American citizens. I do not believe that the people of Oklahoma want that great State to be builded in any sense upon injustice to a vanishing people, who, for a time, are to live under her laws and in the midst of her white population. I believe the people of Oklahoma, if they are fit to come into the Union at all, would pay no heed, in solving the question of justice to the Indians who live within her borders, to the question of the exemption from taxation of the Indian lands. It is a trifle, in a way, compared to Oklahoma and her future and her wealth and her power. It is a question of justice to the Indian. That is what it is.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me, and I can not divorce myself from it, that in this time of all times, with the tribal relation soon to be broken, with these people to pass into a condition of statehood, we ought, as far as we may, to conserve their interest. There are thousands, I think my friend from Colorado said, even of half blood there are 20,000 or more——

Mr. TELLER. Twenty-five thousand.

Mr. SPOONER. Who concededly are incapable of taking care of their own interest, who will fall an easy prey to the white man. Why, Mr. President, should we legislate here forgetful of them? They have the wife and the children, they have posterity to depend more or less upon either their thrift or our care. Why should we pay no heed to them and those who are dependent upon them and upon the wisdom or the power of their action? Is it possible that the Congress of the United States, that the Government of the United States, can devise no system which will enable us to ascertain by investigation from whom the full power of alienation should be withheld and to whom it should be given?

We are impotent if we can not, and, Mr. President, if we can, why should we not? No reason has been given; no reason will be given except that if we wait the Indian lands will be worth more; that is all.

For the life of me I can not see how any harm can come to Oklahoma, how any public interest can be sacrificed, if we wait until another session, in the meantime, by a later bill, providing for a commission, if you please, so that the Indian will not be obliged to come in a posture distasteful to him to an executive officer to investigate this subject; and then let us, intelligently, deliberately, carefully discriminating where we can, free those who ought to be free and keep in this mild pupilage those not capable of protecting their own interest and the interest of their families.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. TELLER. I will wait until the Senator is through.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TELLER. I will wait.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to make my point of order, but I will withhold it.

Mr. President, I am constrained to insist upon my point of order, although I can not urge it against the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not care to discuss the point of order. I do not propose that the Senator from Wisconsin shall appear as the special champion of justice here to our detriment, who have been dealing with this subject for the last two months. We have believed that the interests of the Indians would be promoted by the sale of this land. We have believed that there was a fair price now ready to be paid for it. It is true that if you will withhold this land for a year or five years or ten years you may get more for it, but does our duty to the Indian, whether he be a ward or whether he be a citizen, require that of us? There are people down there who are white and who are citizens and they are entitled morally and legally to all the sympathy of this Government that the red man is, especially since he has become a citizen of the United States.

We have dealt with the red men down there as generously as any people in the history of mankind ever dealt with the natives. The people of the Indian Territory have not any right to complain. We gave them the best land there was in the United States for farming purposes. We gave them a home in a climate that was equal to that of any other in the United States. We guaranteed to them the undisturbed occupation of it, and we never allowed that occupation to be invaded, except when they themselves consented to it. Every white man in that Territory to-day who is there is there by the approval and with the assent and consent of the Indians.

Mr. President, there are a million and a half white men in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory. There are 700,000 or 800,000 white men in the Indian Territory. There are not to exceed in the whole of Oklahoma and Indian Territory 90,000 Indians.

Now, the Senator from Wisconsin may get up his enthusiasm, and he may appeal to us here that we must look after these Indians because they are Indians. What better right have they than the white men have who settled and made this country? Has it been the Indian who has built up this great Government of ours and given it a place amongst the people of the world that no people have ever held before? It is the very men who are looking for homes. It is the very men, Mr. President, who want land, not to wander over, as the Indian does, but land to cultivate, and who propose to bring up families of citizens of the United States on that land. The Indian will occupy but little of that land. An inconsiderable part of it will be cultivated by the Indian now or hereafter. That land is to be cultivated by white men. That land is to be the home of white men. And there is where the strength and glory of this people will come—from the men who cultivate the soil.

Mr. President, if the Senator had thought some years ago of protecting these Indians in land, if that was what they need, he ought to have seen to it that the act of 1887 was not passed. He ought to have stood with me when I was objecting to the opening of this land to white settlement. But that policy was adopted twenty-odd years ago, and that has been the policy ever since.

The white men who went down there went there with the understanding on the part of the Indian and the Government that this land was to be theirs if they were willing to pay what it was worth when the time came for opening it to settlement. Every interest in that country of Indian and white man alike requires that that land should be opened to settlement and occupation, not that it should be withheld until some time later when there may be a demand by capitalists for it, but that it may be taken now by the men who want to work it and to occupy it.

Mr. President, there has been no suggestion of despoiling these Indians. They will get for the land a price that will make it extremely difficult for a white man to go there and make a living. If the land is put up for sale on competition with an appraisement—as it was proposed in this bill, although I believe that has been stricken out—if it shall be appraised, it will bring a price that will make the man who buys it labor and toil for many years before he will be able to pay for it unless he has the necessary capital when he begins.

I know something of what it costs to settle a new country. I know the men who have made land in Oklahoma and the Indian Territory worth $30 or $40 an acre are not the Indians, but the white men who are down there; and if it is to be a State it is to be a State governed and controlled by white men. If we did not believe that the white men would control it, there is not a man here who would vote for its admission.

Mr. President, it is not beneath the dignity of this nation to sympathize with the men who want to own their homes. Every interest that is worthy of our attention requires that this land should be put on the market. It should be put on the market now unless there is to be an inadequate price paid for it. Will the Senator say that that is the fact? Does he know for certain that it will bring more a year from now? Is it more certain that it will bring more ten years from now? Would he suggest that you should keep it for ten years?

No, Mr. President. Sympathy for the Indian is one thing and justice to the white men down there is another. It is obligatory upon me and upon the Senator from Wisconsin to deal justly with those men as it is to deal justly with the Indian. We allowed the white men to go there. The Indian consented that they should go there, and they went there with the understanding that they should buy that surplus land when an allotment was made to the Indian, and the Indian should get his land not a generation later. They are the men who have made it worth from practically nothing to $30 and $40 an acre and some of it over $100 an acre.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I believe the best thing that we can do is to give those people an opportunity to become landowners. I am one of those who believe that the strength and the hope of this nation is with the men who till the soil and who own the soil that they till. I have heard a great deal said about the man who follows the plow. Mr. President, the man who follows the plow on some other man's land is a serf. If he follows it on his own he is a freeman, and he becomes a good citizen. That is what I want to see. If it could be done I would like to see the Government buy this land and turn it over to every man who would go there and make a home on it. I believe it would have added to our wealth and strength and to our glory to have done that. But that is not the policy.

Men want to go down there now and pay $30 or $40 an acre for the land. They will not buy very big tracts, because if they do they will not be able to pay for it. There are some sections of country where possibly they can pay $50 or $100 an acre, but those are exceptions.

Now, Mr. President, I suppose the Senator can make his point of order, and judging from the ruling of the Chair heretofore the point of order will be well taken. Then the land will not be sold, and then the men who are down there waiting and anxious to make homes, not to become tenants, but to become owners and landlords, will not be able to buy homes. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned they shall not lay it at my door. If the Senator is willing that they should lay it at his, he may have all the glory he can get out of it.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I wish to say a word further on this question. I stated that I believed it was to the interest of the Indian that these restrictions should be removed. I so state again. It is not only to the interest of the Indian, but it is to the interest of the Indian Territory and of all the people living there that this should be done. So far as I know, there is no division of sentiment among the Indians or the white people upon this proposition. It should be done, because it is to the interest of the Indian. He may, if he holds his land, obtain more for it a year from now, and he may obtain less. The fact is the land is being sold now, not upon the open market to the highest bidder, but sold by an arrangement with a speculator, who agrees to get the restrictions removed and makes a side contract at the same time.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] may know more about this question than the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, that reported a provision similar to this, or the House of Representatives, that put the provision in the Five Civilized Tribes bill. He may know more about the question than the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate, that investigated it for many days, but he will pardon me for saying that I doubt if he does. I regret that the Senator has made the point of order upon this amendment, that is substantially the same that passed the Senate in the other bill to which I have referred.

I believe that there is a majority of the Senate in favor of this amendment. I hope that the Senator from Wisconsin will permit the Senate to express its judgment upon the proposition, for if he does not do so now, I say to him that the question must be settled at the next session, and that we must meet it then. It is better to settle it now and let this amendment be adopted, for it is justice to the white people of the Indian Territory and also to the Indians who are in favor of its adoption.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the sarcasm of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LONG] is very withering, but I still have life enough left to make a point of order.

I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was not quite generous when he twitted me, if not reprobated me, for not espousing the cause of the Indian in this particular behalf in 1887. The Senator must remember that I was only a year old then as a Senator; and in those days I did not feel at liberty, in fact I was afraid of the Senate, and I did not dare differ from any old Senator. I had fallen into the notion that whatever an old Senator said must be right, and it took me quite a while to discover that that is not always so [laughter], although generally it may be.

Mr. TILLMAN. Accidentally, I suppose.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Colorado to-morrow will not think that it was exactly just to impute to me the opinion that I am the sole champion of the Indians here. I only speak what I think and what it seems to me I ought to say after thinking all I have been able to of the matter before the Senate and do what I ought to do.

Mr. TELLER. That is right.

Mr. SPOONER. There are two sides to this matter. It is a difficult and intricate question. I admit, of course, that the Committee on Indian Affairs has given it careful consideration. I should have thought once that the committee were infallible, but after an experience of sixteen years here, while I think they are pretty nearly infallible, I have been forced to the conclusion that no committee of the Senate is absolutely infallible, and that there is a borderland upon which a man can differ from a committee without impeaching either the good faith or the patriotism or the ability of the committee.

Mr. President, I will cooperate to the utmost of my power to devise, for passage at this session, some law—and there could be no difficulty in passing it—which will enable us to discriminate between those who need the protection now thrown around them and those who need it not.

Mr. President, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Rule XVI provides that—

> No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

That the proposed amendment is general legislation the Chair has no doubt. Therefore, the amendment being obnoxious to the rule, the Chair thinks it not in order; and he sustains the point of order.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I understand that practically closes this bill. I do not intend to bring up any question that will delay the Senate in disposing of the bill; but in justice, I think, to the committee, I want to call attention to the amendment which was reported by the committee on page 36, which has since been stricken out on motion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I am not going to ask to replace it, unless the Senator who objected to it is satisfied. It provides:

That all Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen whose names appear upon the rolls of said tribes as approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall each have the preference right to purchase, at a valuation to be ascertained by appraisement to be hereafter made under rules and regulations prescribed by said Secretary, 80 acres of the unallotted lands of said tribes.

Mr. President, those colored people, freedmen, had each about from 20 to 40 acres of land. They were supposed to have had in the first instance 40 acres, but an appraisement was put on the land, and when they took certain high-priced lands some got less, but none of them got more than 40 acres. Some of those men have orchards, gardens, and fields adjoining their 40 acres. They were anxious to buy those lands. The Indians opposed their purchasing, because the appraisement was made some years ago and was supposed to be very low. Thereupon the committee, in order that there should be no injustice done to the Indians, provided that they should have a preference right to purchase at the valuation to be ascertained by appraisement, to be hereafter made under rules and regulations prescribed by the Interior Department.

It was, as I understood it, the policy of the Department to have an appraisement made of all this land. Certainly that ought to be done, and there should be a price below which none of this land should be sold. This amendment was simply put in the bill for the purpose of allowing the Indians to have the enhanced price—the present price. The Senator who moved to strike it out said they ought to buy at the market price, but the appraised price will be the lowest possible market price. If the Senator insists upon his objection to the amendment, I do not want to go into a discussion of it at this time, and therefore I shall let the matter drop.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I must insist on it; but, in justice to myself, I wish to have inserted in the RECORD a letter written to me by Mr. D. C. McCurtain, Choctaw delegate, whose reasons appear to be so eminently just and proper that I could not help moving to strike the provision out. I want that letter to be printed in the RECORD as an explanation of why I offered the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD, as requested.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 18, 1906.

Hon. BENJAMIN R. TILLMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Choctaw tribe of Indians, through me, as their delegate and a member of their tribe, desires to object to the committee amendment on the Indian appropriation bill now pending before the Senate as follows:

"That all Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen whose names appear upon the rolls of said tribes as approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall each have the preference right to purchase, at a valuation to be ascertained by appraisement to be hereafter made under rules and regulations prescribed by said Secretary, 80 acres more of the unallotted lands of said tribes"—

And would ask that you present their objections on the floor of the Senate.

In the first place, what right has Congress got to say that the lands belonging to the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians shall sell for not more than a certain price, to be ascertained, to a certain class of people? This method of disposing of the Indians' property without their consent is not far from appropriating the Indians' property for private purposes, and, indeed, it may amount to the same thing so far as this provision is concerned, for it will be observed that the language of the amendment is that the freedmen shall have the "right to purchase at a valuation to be ascertained, etc.," not at the actual or market value of said lands. It can hardly be successfully contended that this proposed sale of the Indians' lands to the Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen under a special privilege is a disposition of the land to the public or to public uses when it is considered that the Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen constitute a very small part even of the Indian public.

What right has this class of tribal citizens to concessions or privileges that are not extended to other classes of tribal citizens? If the freedmen are to be permitted to buy so much land in excess of their lawful allotments at a refusal price, why are not the Indian citizens and the intermarried white citizens extended the same privilege? It can not be that the freedmen have rights which the Indians and the intermarried white citizens have not, for the freedmen's rights are limited under the law to 40 acres of the average allottable land of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, while the other citizens, the Indians and the intermarried white citizens, in addition to their respective allotments, have an undivided interest in the residue lands—that is, the lands that will be left after all the allotments have been made. These residue or unallotted lands, under the present law, are to be sold, not allotted, and the money divided among the citizens, exclusive of freedmen. So it will be seen that the right of the Indian and intermarried citizens is superior to that of the freedmen, yet it is proposed here to give to the freedmen a privilege which is not accorded to other citizens of a superior right. Indeed, the Supreme Court of the United States has held in a case appealed from the United States Court of Claims that the Chickasaw freedmen, to whom it is now proposed to extend special privileges, are not entitled to allotments of land in the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and that the allotments given them will have to be paid for by the United States Government according to the terms of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902. Under the law the Choctaw freedmen are entitled to 40 acres of the average allottable land of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, and nothing more, not even to any part of the tribal funds from whatever source they may arise.

The Choctaw freedman occupies an entirely different position to that of the Choctaw Indian with respect to his right of property; he does not take property by virtue of any tribal status he ever had as the slave of a Choctaw Indian citizen, for as such he never had any tribal status, but he takes his limited rights by operation of the treaty of 1866 and subsequent laws, while the Indian takes his property by virtue of his Indian citizenship. As one of the penalties for the Choctaws having cast their lot with those of the "lost cause," they were required by the United States Government to take care of their freedmen, and this they did most magnanimously by giving to the former slave and each of his descendants 40 acres of land, something that was not done by or required of any other people of the South. This fact is not mentioned in a spirit of resentment, for I live in a second generation since that unpleasantness; but I call attention to this as showing how the Choctaw freedman came to have any rights at all to Choctaw land—that they do not take it by virtue of any inherent right thereto, but purely by operation of law, and limitedly at that. The Choctaws can see no right that the freedmen have to this special privilege proposed in the amendment complained of, and having no right, we hope that the privilege will not be extended to them of buying our lands at a refusal price.

Aside from the fact that the freedmen have no right, as the Choctaws can see, to this special privilege, we do not think it would be good policy to thus dispose of the Indian's lands. The freedman, in his ordinary circumstances, and there are as many freedmen of ordinary circumstances in the Indian Territory as elsewhere, will not be able to buy this land even if given the privilege, unless it is sold to him on long credit, and very long credit at that. The Indian race will have disappeared before the freedmen can finish paying for as much land as they would be permitted to take under the proposed amendment, and from this standpoint alone the Indian has good ground for opposing the amendment. Furthermore, the interests of the country will not be materially advanced, if at all, by putting this much land in the hands of the freedmen, for they are not by nature creative geniuses, and barring a few exceptions, remarkable for their fewness, the Choctaw freedmen will not work the forty acres they already have.

The Choctaws would prefer, if the surplus or residue lands are to be sold, that such lands be sold as now provided by law. This plan will enable an industrious and enterprising class of white people to come into the Territory and buy lands upon which to build homes, and we figure that by getting some of the lands into the hands of a class of people who will improve them, besides those already improved, the value of the unimproved lands in the hands of the Indians will be thereby enhanced. Not only that, but the lands will bring more if put upon an open market than they would under a "valuation to be ascertained" and sold to the freedmen. Sell the land, if at all, under the present law, and the country will advance, and the Indians will receive full value for the lands. Sell it to the freedmen under the proposed plan, and no one, except a few freedmen, perhaps, will be materially benefited by such a sale.

I regret, Senator, the necessity of having to worry you with the consideration of our matters, but you will remember we are political orphans down there and must depend upon the indulgence of some one up here to represent us on the floors of Congress.

Trusting that you will have time to give consideration to this matter when the consideration of the report on the Indian bill is resumed in the Senate, I beg to remain,

Yours, very respectfully,

D. C. MCCURTAIN,
Choctaw Delegate, the Savoy.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAPP. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 30, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 28, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by Rev. CHARLES ALVIN SMITH, of Peck Memorial Chapel, Washington, D. C., as follows:

O our merciful God, Thou who art so good and so great and so supernal, we acknowledge our great indebtedness to Thee for this beautiful day and for all it means to our hearts, giving us another day in which to work, to think, to love, to live; and we pray Thee that we may use our energy of mind and body and soul in the service of our country and our fellow-man. Bless these our servants, we beseech Thee, O God, who are gathered here this morning and this day to do the nation's business amidst all the pressure of life and the many things they have to do. Give them clear minds and loving hearts that they may devote these things to this great and loyal and magnificent service, to the end that Thy name and righteousness may be honored and glorified.

We thank Thee, O God, that Thou hast blessed us so much, and we pray Thee that as we gather together from time to time to do the work Thou hast assigned us in our several spheres of activity that Thou wilt help us to remember that what we do here is recorded yonder. Bless these dear men and their families—wives and children and homes. Bless their States, their districts, and all whom they love and whom Thou lovest, that this nation may be one that shall be a beacon light that shall blaze abroad that which is good and true and worth living for.

We would remember this morning that dear man of God, the Chaplain of this House, who is engaged upon that sad duty of burying his dear boy. Will there ever come a time, O our God, will our boys ever be too old but that they shall always be our boys? We pray Thee that in this his hour of bereavement and sadness and tears that there may come to him Thy comfort, Thy consolation, and our sympathy. Amidst all life, O God, amidst its prosperity and adversities, with its tears of laughter or tears of joy, may we never lose our grip upon Thee, knowing that Thou art our Father and that Thou lovest us. We beseech Thee to hear the prayer we pray because of this fact:

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name; Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FOSS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriation for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

THE PRACTICE OF PHARMACY IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 8997, being a bill to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the District of Columbia.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8997) entitled "An act to regulate the practice of pharmacy and the sale of poisons in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, and 49, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate insert:

"Provided, That applicants shall be not less than twenty-one years of age, and shall have had at least four years' experience in the practice of pharmacy or shall have served three years under the instruction of a regular licensed pharmacist, and any applicant who has been graduated from a school or college of pharmacy recognized by said board as in good standing shall be entitled to examination upon presentation of his diploma."

And the Senate agree to the same.

P. P. CAMPBELL,
E. L. TAYLOR, Jr.,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

J. H. GALLINGER,
E. J. BURKETT,
THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The House recedes from its disagreement to all of the amendments of the Senate except No. 7, and agrees to the same.

These amendments are all in the nature of correcting phraseology or making minor changes in the text, and result in perfecting and strengthening the bill.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 7, and agrees to the same with an amendment providing that the applicants for licenses as pharmacists in the District of Columbia shall have had at least four years of experience in the practice of pharmacy. The amendment of the Senate required but three years of experience. The conference agreement on amendment numbered 7 will make this requirement of four years conform to the practice in the surrounding States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING SUNDAY.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when adjournment is taken to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, in order that at that hour memorial services may be begun of Judge PINCKNEY, of Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House adjourn to-day to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow, instead of 12, as fixed by prior order of the House, for reasons stated by him. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18537—the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, after the Republican party had been awakened from its insolent sense of false security and had concluded that it had better take the field and carry the war into Africa, when it cast its eyes over this body it could find nobody better fitted to act the part of Scipio Africanus than the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the sledge-hammer debater on that side. He does not indulge in Addisonian phrase, and he was never known, until yesterday, to take a back track. He did not, like the other partridges, either pursue a partridge circle or run along the ground, but he did what I never heard of but one partridge doing in my life—he took to the woods. That reminds me of a story that a friend of mine told me about a partridge. He said he went out and flushed a covey; some of the birds ran along the ground, here one ran along by himself, and here was a clump of three or four, and there the main body. He took a shot at them, and then he noticed that one old he-bird had done the thing contrary to all rules of partridge life—he had taken to the woods, to a limb in a tree on the edge of a deadening. The hunter said, "I have vowed never to kill a bird sitting, but you have outraged all partridge practice, and I am going to take a shot at you." The gentleman from Iowa on yesterday violated all the laws of his own being, as hitherto illustrated by his acts at any rate, and took to a tree—took to the woods; hence we may take a shot at him, even though sitting. [Laughter.]

He stood out at first like Ajax defying the lightning. "I am tired of statements; I want proofs; I must have proofs." He repeated that more than once. How majestic he looked! With what a bold front did he face this side of the House! Like Ajax he defied the lightning; but unlike Ajax, at the third flash of the lightning, which came from his "stalwart" colleague, as he called him, the young gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], he incontinently fled. This is the first time in my life I have ever seen the gentleman from Iowa fail to follow up an attack. He called for the proof; proof was forthcoming. The Chair said: "To whom will the gentleman yield?" The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY, and I, both being on our feet. This colonel from Iowa, my friend Mr. HEPBURN, said: "To either of them, or both." Then the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] gave him a part of the proof. He referred him to the testimony of James J. Hill, president of the Great Northern Railway, which testimony I will come to in the course of my remarks, saying that his company, the Great Northern Railroad Company, had bought rails, shipped along the same line, sold by the same company, of American steel rail makers, at $7 a ton less for that part of the rails to be laid on Canadian soil than for that part of the shipment to be laid upon American soil. And when I gave him some more of the proof—and I repeat it over again—that the late Daniel Lamont, who, whatever may have been his political faults, was a man of splendid business integrity and of absolute truthfulness, so far as I know or ever heard, told me in the Manhattan Club, in the city of New York, during the last Presidential campaign, that I could make the same assertion Hill made with regard to the Great Northern Railway whenever I chose upon the stump, and the first time it was questioned refer questioners to him. He was a member of the board of directors and one of the officers of the Great Northern company, and he stated it to me as a matter of his own knowledge. In that campaign, at Brooklyn, N. Y., and elsewhere, I made the statement of fact, challenged denial, and said that in case of denial I had the permission of one of the highest officers of the Great Northern to refer to him. It was never denied to my knowledge until yesterday, by the gentleman from Iowa. The steel trust had every reason to deny if it could. Then it was that the gentleman from Georgia arose with a book in his hand, and then it was that the old he bird of the covey took to a tree [laughter], and called upon the Chair in a pathetic tone of voice to protect him from the "stalwart Member" from Georgia. [Laughter.]

Meantime there came popping up from all quarters on this side of the Chamber Members having pamphlets, books—everything. I gathered them and ran over there by the side of the gentleman from Iowa and said, "I am ready now to furnish the gentleman with the proof which he challenges." He said, "Furnish us with the proof in your own time and not in mine." I said, "Oh, the gentleman has called for the proof now," and then he replied that I would have time. Yes; and I hazarded the remark then that when I got time I would not challenge proof on any proposition from any Member on this floor and then refuse to take the proof when it was handed to me. Now, let us analyze the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], the sledge hammer of debate—the ablest debater on either side upon this floor, by long odds—and it will be seen how weak the present position of the Republican party must be when it is noticed how feebly it was defended by this strongest debater in this House. What was his speech when he got through with all of it, when we bring it down to its rationale? It was this: "Republican prosperity"—and I have heard him make the same speech several times, and several times better than he made it yesterday, although he made it very well even then—"Republican prosperity accompanying Republican tariff;" "hard times under Democratic government;" a few words about "slavery and the war;" a trumpet tone to Republicans "to stand by" the party; and that was all, as far as any connection between that speech and present existing industrial conditions is concerned, except his attempted denial of a fact that has been admitted by everybody else in the United States that I know of except himself, to wit, that our protected manufacturers—some of them; many of them—sell habitually abroad at prices cheaper than they charge at home.

Let us now run further in detail into the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. I am going to give an impartial résumé of his talk as well as I can. The first position taken by my friend from Iowa was that the position of the Democratic party "had been at all times that of free traders," and he quoted the platform of 1848 and the platform of 1856 and several other platforms in which were used the words "free trade" in rather a loose sense, until he came down to that celebrated Democratic platform which rang with the slogan of "free trade and sailors' rights." In connection with that last platform, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] seemed to think that it had something to do with the tariff. The free trade referred to in that slogan was, if I remember aright, the freedom of American commerce from foreign attack upon the ocean [applause], and had no more to do with this question than I have to do with the opinions of St. Peter as to who should enter the kingdom of heaven. Yet the gentleman was replying to a statement of mine that the Democratic party had "never 'stood for' free trade before the war or since the war." Instead of answering that statement, he quotes party platforms; instead of citing party action, which would have shown not what the party delegates in conventions said, but what the party itself "stood for."

What had all that to do with present conditions anyhow? Suppose I was wrong; what had it to do with the pressing questions growing out of present conditions? But I am not wrong. The Democratic party, while it has used the words "free trade" in a loose manner in several platforms, has never yet enacted or attempted to enact a free-trade tariff law. It could not under our constitutional limitations, if it had wanted to.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me finish this. Unless it is pertinent to this very remark, I would like to finish this particular matter. Now I will explain to the gentleman from Iowa the difference between a tariff for free trade and a tariff for revenue only, and I hope that hereafter he will never confuse them. The present British tariff is a tariff for free trade. The Walker tariff and the tariff of 1857 were tariffs for revenue only. How do they differ? The British tariff for free trade levies a tariff only on a few articles and they only noncompeting articles—that is, articles that are not produced in the country levying the tariff—and if it levies any tariff upon any other articles at all it is only for the purpose of countervailing internal-revenue duties upon those other articles; as in the case of the British high tariff upon tobacco and upon beer and whisky to countervail the internal-revenue duty. Then there may be a small duty for statistical purposes—5 per cent, or less than 5 per cent—on a few things, not for the purpose of doing anything except to keep tab upon those things entering the custom-house for statistical purposes. The British writers call these last "statistical duties." Now, that is the British tariff; that is tariff for free trade, levied purposely upon things not produced in the country, purposely upon noncompeting articles, so as not to disturb one way or the other the business of the people living in Great Britain, who produce things there. Now, what is a tariff for revenue only? The Walker tariff is an illustration. It is a low tariff spread over nearly all importations. If my memory serves me right, salt was the only thing of any importance imported and not taxed under the Walker tariff. Being levied for the purpose of revenue only, such a tariff is levied impartially upon competing and noncompeting products and regardless of the fact that even the very lowest tariff levied upon a given article does carry with it, necessarily and unavoidably a certain measure of protection.

A tariff of 5 per cent even gives the home producer 5 per cent advantage, at any rate, of the foreigner who would export the same goods into the American market. Under the British tariff they would not even levy that 5 per cent, because they would not want to give any advantage, incidental or otherwise, to the home producer. Their object is more to preserve free trade than it is to get revenue. Under our system, where we have not the direct taxes of the British Empire to resort to as a main source of revenue, we not only have always had a tariff for revenue only, as the thing for which the Democracy practically "stood" when it came to pass an act—sometimes it did not get down to it, but it never got below it—but we have been forced to rely on it because our Constitution requires that "direct taxes shall be apportioned amongst the States," and therefore makes it impractical to levy direct taxes for the use of the Federal Government at all, and now since the Supreme Court has set aside the uniform rulings of a hundred years and declared an income tax unconstitutional it is the more necessary that we should have a tariff as our chief reliance for revenue. Now, then, the Walker tariff and other tariffs of this revenue and not free-trade character were in force and effect when these very platforms which the gentleman read were adopted, some of the platforms being adopted before and some of them afterwards, two platforms being adopted while the Walker tariff was upon the statute books and one during the tariff of 1857, both being samples of "tariff for revenue only." America has never had free trade, and from the very nature of our fundamental law it can not have free trade and run the Government at all. [Applause.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that, in view of the fact that the gentleman from Iowa emphasized yesterday the statement that the Democratic party was a party in favor of free trade, he remind the gentleman of the fact that the nearest approach that this country ever made to a free-trade policy was in the tariff of 1857, which was a reduction below the Walker tariff of 1846, and that the tariff of 1857 was enacted when a stanch Republican, Nathaniel P. Banks, was Speaker of this House, and when Lewis D. Campbell, a protectionist of Ohio, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and when there were only three Democrats on the Ways and Means Committee, in the Thirty-fourth Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is absolutely true, and not only true, but it was enacted because the Walker tariff by its working had so completely justified itself in the popular mind that there was no desire even upon the part of the Whigs to raise any of the duties, but a desire to lower them wherever it could be done consonantly with keeping up the revenue of the Government, as they did lower them by the act of 1857.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to ask the gentleman if there was a panic in 1857?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was a panic in 1857, and there was a panic in 1867 with a Republican tariff; a panic in 1873 with a Republican tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And a great panic, which began in 1890, with farmers in Kansas burning their corn for fuel and farmers in Mississippi selling their cotton below the actual cost of production, until it had swept itself away from the farmer, who first suffered, to the banker and caused an acute bursting in high financial circles in 1893. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The panic of 1873—horrible in its aspects, with "Molly McGuires" and all that—was under a Republican tariff. And the hard times and panic from 1890 to 1893 saw its incipiency and its end under a Republican tariff. By the way, it was a very small panic in 1857 and a bigger panic—the most serious we have ever had—in 1873.

Mr. Chairman, I have been trying for a long time to get to my analysis of the speech of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and I am a little afraid if I do not get to it sometime to-day people will think that I have taken to a tree myself; so, with the good will of the House, I shall proceed. After the gentleman from Iowa had gone as far as he did into ancient history, he finally admitted the truth about our position, which is that we are simply "antiprotectionists," but not free traders; that we are tariff-for-revenue people; that we do want to maintain the Government of the United States; that we know we have got to have money to maintain it; that we know we must raise the major part of that money by a tariff. We may regret the latter fact, but we face it and surrender to it, as we do to all facts. We would not inaugurate protectionism where it does not now exist. We would remove it wherever it does exist as rapidly as it can be safely done.

We would continue in this course until we could levy tariff taxes with an eye single to public needs, regardless of private schemes. We would not permit the taxing power to be used with the paramount or sole end of protection; for the purpose of favoritism, in a word. Our purpose is revenue. If, as an unavoidable and necessary incident to getting needed revenue, there came somewhat of protection, that of course we could not help. I have already stated that even a 5 per cent duty carries at least 5 per cent of advantage for the home producer against the foreign producer who would export from his country to the United States. That is unavoidable. But our purpose will be to get revenue. Our method will be to tax consumers as nearly as possible equally in proportion to their ability to bear the needful burden. Now, we do hold, as the gentleman from Iowa said we did, that protectionism is robbery, and I am coming to that in a minute and am going to show why it is robbery. We do not hold that a tariff is robbery. Why, a tariff levied for the purpose of supporting the Government, no matter whether there go with it (as an unavoidable incident but not as an end) a certain degree of protection or not, is no more robbery than any other form of taxation for public purposes levied upon the citizen is. We do hold that taking money out of my pocket or the pocket of anyone else, not for the purpose of supporting the Government, not for public use or a public end, but for the purpose of supporting some other producer—for private use and private end—is a totally unjustifiable prostitution of governmental functions, and that as such it is robbery—a legislative confiscation of my means pro tanto in order to benefit somebody else. I hold moreover that we can not repeat nor emphasize that idea too often or too much.

What is robbery? Robbery is a taking in whole or in part of what belongs to one for the use of another. So much for that.

Then the gentleman said that there was a certain degree of "dumping" going on. Now dumping, Mr. Chairman, is a spasmodic act. Dumping is not a habit; dumping is not a constant practice; dumping is not a part of ordinary business, and when I get to the proof which the gentleman asked for I will show that these processes we have been going through of selling cheaper abroad than at home have been too extensive as to articles and too long enduring as to time to be dismissed with a phrase; "dumping." Yesterday the gentleman from Iowa was very careful not to come down to present existing industrial conditions.

Not a single bill pending before this House did the gentleman mention. In connection with not a single question of tariff abuse now attracting our attention concerning any schedule of the tariff did he concern himself in speaking. He only made a general all-around "whoop-it-up-you-Republicans-and-stand-to-the-party" speech. He said that the "measure of protection" for which he stood was this, "The difference between cost of production here and the cost of production abroad;" and yet I have introduced a bill into this House to reduce duties (except, of course, upon alcohol and tobacco, where the duty must countervail the internal-revenue tax)—to reduce duties wherever they are above 100 per cent down to 100 per cent. Can it be possible that the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad is ever more than the entire cost of production? Yet I heard not the gentleman raise his voice to help me with that bill before the Committee on Ways and Means. I want his constituents in Iowa to know that he has never been before the Committee on Ways and Means to ask them to consider that or a similar bill, or any other bill, to correct or revise a single schedule of the Dingley bill, however much of an abuse. I ask him now to get upon this floor before this session closes and tell his constituents in Iowa whether he will or will not vote for such a bill. Will he stand by his own "measure of protection?" Or will he again fly to a tree?

Mr. Chairman, upon yesterday I was interrupted to such an extent that I did not reach the body of my argument. Indeed, I was interrupted so rapidly and so furiously that something happened to me that never happened before in my life. I began to tell an anecdote and forgot to finish it. I have no idea of finishing the anecdote now. It is too late for the effect. I mention that to show the character of interruptions. I shall ask gentlemen this morning, in the interest of the House itself, not to interrupt me unless with questions, and those questions must be pertinent to the very point upon which I am at the time dwelling. I do not say that in defense of myself. But I fear I may wear out the patience of the House beyond all measure—may become persona non grata to the House.

Now I shall go on with the analysis of the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. The next thing I noted, as I have partially said already, was the gentleman's "dumping" theory. He undertook to account for the fact that a great many of our manufacturers were selling goods cheaper abroad than at home upon the theory that they were "dumping" goods there; and the gentleman seemed to think that we were complaining of the process of dumping. He misunderstood the gravamen of our complaint. Our complaint is that they do not dump on us. Whenever they have anything good and cheap we think they might dump it upon the American consumer. We think that if there were a natural course of business, a normal state of affairs, that they would just as soon sell goods cheap to you and me as sell them cheap to the Frenchman and the Englishman.

The gentleman quoted from Mr. Ashley; but Ashley's dumping theory was a totally different thing. It was where an association of manufacturers are purposely "dumping" goods at less than the cost, or at less than a reasonable profit, for the purpose of obtaining a start in a new market. This American "dumping," which has been carried on by the United States Steel Association, for example, for over ten years, has been in markets which they hold very much more nearly than the manufacturers of any other country. Ashley also refered to the dumping which is founded upon the idea of retaining an old market from the attacks of new competitors. But neither of these cases is like the American dumping system, if, indeed, the word "dumping" might apply to the latter at all. Our "dumping," if it may be called dumping, is under agreement between American manufacturers not to sell in the American markets at less than a fixed price. Anything that can not be sold at this fixed price is by agreement shipped abroad, not at a loss, though at a less price than the domestic price. It is not an emergency sale now and then, but an habitual business.

Then there comes the "surplus" theory. Gentlemen say, "We send only our surplus abroad." Now, Mr. Chairman, what is a surplus? I understand how there could be a surplus at a certain price, but if the price is lowered it decreases the surplus. There is always a price at which there is no surplus at all, and if there be a price at which there is no surplus at all, and that be a profitable price, we think that American tariff-protected manufacturers ought not to resort to this scheme of selling cheaper abroad than at home, but ought to let us have equal advantage; and if it be that they accept an unprofitable price now and then under the dire necessities of trade, when they must dispose of a certain quantity of goods at a loss, then, I reply, the American people ought to obtain the incidental benefit of the misfortune of the American manufacturer rather than the foreigner.

Now, the truth is, Mr. Chairman, that our selling abroad, except in individual and exceptional instances, is neither a surplus nor a dumping process. It is a surplus process in this sense, that at the price which the combinations fix for the sale of their goods in America there is a surplus—a surplus over and above an effective demand at the exploitation price charged the American home consumer. The moment that surplus arises at the exploitation price, instead of reducing their price to the home consumer down to a reasonable profit, they prefer to maintain the exploitation price unbroken at home and to ship abroad this exploitation-price surplus—this so-called surplus—to be sold to the foreigner at the lower price, and thus "save their home market," as they express it. That is the situation in a nutshell. And I now tell gentlemen upon the other side in connection with this well-to-be-remembered thing that they need not attempt to surround it, to avoid it; it is a fact, it is irrefutable; it is an indisputable fact, and I am going to prove it before I get through to-day to every man who has not sufficient information already to know it. It will do gentlemen no good to blink it. It will do gentlemen no good to try to evade it.

Gentlemen can not walk over it nor around it; gentlemen have got to consider what the fact is, what it means, and what justifiable, logical conclusion can be drawn from it, and whether they wish the conditions to continue which make it a fact. They must defend this system or they must destroy it, one of the two. I say they have either got to reduce the tariff to a point where, when the American manufacturer is exploiting the American consumer at an unreasonable profit, while he is selling abroad at a reasonable profit, the foreign goods may come in and stop the process of exploitation, or else they must go before the country and defend the system itself. They can neither deny the fact nor can they get out of it as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] attempted to do about the watch matter. What was his plea there? After first denying, or seeming to deny, that there was any system of this sort, he finally said, "Yes; it is going on, but it is only going on about what they call 'nickel watches' or gilt watches."

It reminds me of the man who was arrested in Texas and was about to be hung by a mob to a tree for stealing a horse. At first he denied that he had stolen the horse, and he made all sorts of proof, much even of an irrelevent character. He tried to prove an alibi, and did prove a good character, and did everything else, but they kept crowding him and crowding him and crowding him, and after a while he had to meet the issue squarely. He said: "Yes, boys; remember my mother, remember my wife, remember how much they depend on me; I did steal the horse, but it wasn't any big horse, hardly a horse at all; it was nothing but a little bit of a colt, and the colt of a Mexican pony at that." [Laughter.]

Why, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], in the course of his remarks, quoted from Mr. Schwab himself testimony against his own statement, but I leave that to the record as it stands. The gentleman gave you "his measure of protection," I have quoted it to you. The President has given his "measure of protection." It is slightly different from the "measure of protection" of the gentleman from Iowa. I was about to give it yesterday when I yielded the floor for adjournment. The President's measure of protection advocacy is "the difference between the scale of wages here and the scale of wages abroad."

Now, I say that any fair-minded man will admit that the difference between the scale of wages abroad and the scale of wages here can never amount to the total labor cost entering into the total cost of a given product. Now, then, the total labor cost entering into a product will not be on an average over 25 or 30 per cent of the total cost of its production—labor, material, transportation to America, and all. There are some products so near the state of raw material that it may be slightly more, but the more highly finished the product is the more is the work of transformation done by machinery, and the less comparatively is the proportion of man-labor cost entering into the total cost of the finished product.

I say that in consequence of that fact few men will deny the statement that a reasonable revenue tariff will more than make up for any difference that exists between the scale of wages abroad and the scale of wages here, especially if the lowest revenue duty is placed on tools and raw materials, "the necessaries of industry." For example, take cheviots manufactured here and manufactured in the English markets. I have the amount of labor cost entering into the goods in each country, and I have the amount of the total cost entering into the goods in each country, and I think it will astonish some of you gentlemen to know that as regards this article, which I am using only as an illustration, the proportion that the labor cost bears to the total cost in Great Britain is 30 per cent plus, and the proportion which the labor cost bears to the total cost in America is only 24 per cent plus. In other words, the proportion is less in Great Britain. This is true also of steel products, as I shall incidentally show later on. Why? Because our people have in the business better machinery and more efficient labor and laborers that tend more machinery and work longer hours than in Great Britain—eight hours there universally against ten here generally; labor which moreover turns out more product per hour while working.

I quote from the unpublished manuscript of a book entitled "Tariff Reform," being prepared by Professor Conner, some time an instructor in economics in the University of Iowa and later holding the same position in the University of Pennsylvania. He quotes from the Report of the Bureau of Labor, Senate Document No. 20, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, as an illustration, the figures concerning cost and labor cost of cheviots. Here are the tables:

Men's sack suits, United States, 1897, cheviot:

Cost of labor in transforming materials	$1.17
Cost of all items except labor	3.58
Total cost	4.75

In Great Britain the cost of making the cheapest grades of sack suits, whether of worsted, serge, or tweed (no cheviot given), was each as follows:

Cost of labor in transforming materials	$1.56
Cost of all other items	3.18
Total	4.74

Here note that the labor cost in Great Britain is both absolutely and relatively greater than in the United States.

There are articles, of course, where the labor cost in Great Britain forms a larger proportion of the total cost than it does here; but I venture to say that in no case can any gentleman find a case where the difference between the two labor costs will amount to over 15 or 20 per cent—mark me, the difference between the two items of labor cost entering into the yard, the pound, or the bale of goods; not the total cost of labor in either country, nor the per diem wage. So I am willing to take the President's "measure of protection," if he will only stand by it; because it will require only a revenue tariff, and one under the maximum revenue-yielding point at that.

But the gentleman from Iowa says that the Republican platform said that the tariff was to be revised "without injury to any American industry." I noticed that word "any." It is going pretty far. What does it mean when you bring it down to the final and practical analysis? It means that they will not revise it when "anybody" complains. Now, what does that mean? Why, it is the old fallacy, as old as the world; the claim of vested right in an existing wrong. It is the old, old appeal—as old as the world—the appeal not to remedy an evil, however palpable and great the evil may be, lest the men who are being benefited at the time by the existence of the evil shall lose their benefit.

You can not stand upon that, gentlemen. Then the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] went on to boast of our great foreign commerce, "our intercourse with foreign nations," as he called it. I have had already the honor once before at this session of demonstrating upon this floor that our intercourse with foreign nations—our volume of foreign trade—imports added to exports—is less in proportion to our population and is less in proportion to our wealth than that of Canada or that of the Argentine Republic. So another of your Republican positions, founded on a false boast, goes by the board. Then he went on to show our progress under the tariff for the last ten years. Upon yesterday, in reply to a question from Mr. LANDIS, of Indiana, I took up the figures of increase in the last ten census years, and compared them with the increase of the decade from 1850 to 1860 under the lowest tariff we have ever had, and I demonstrated yesterday that in production of corn, in railroad mileage, in manufacturing increase, even, in both capital and product, the percentage of increase from 1850 to 1860 had exceeded the percentage from 1890 to 1900.

The gentleman then made one of the most wonderful arguments I ever heard of. He said people talk about "the good old times," but he described how hard the times were as compared with our good times. How did he prove his statement? He proved it by an assertion which, if true, is the most astonishing demonstration of unparalleled prosperity in those "hard old times" that the world ever saw. What was it? It is his assertion; it is not mine. He says that in those early days in Iowa men paid 40 per cent for money when they went out upon their homesteads and cleared the forests, and yet that they built themselves homes and saved those homes. Ah, what a state of prosperity that must have been when men could pay 40 per cent and still build for themselves homes in the wilderness and come out free of debt. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, a man could not do it to-day on 10 per cent. High rates of interest are not indicia of hard times. On the contrary, whenever times are flush productive enterprises are growing; men want to add to existing plants or found new plants, and so anxious are they that they borrow to do it; consequently the number of borrowers increases—that is, the number of men who can, or think they can, make money by borrowing money—and the number of lenders decreases, both because they are already lending so much and because most men having money think they can get a better return by using it themselves on farm or in mill than by lending. As the rate of interest depends upon the number of borrowers or would-be borrowers on the one side, which constitutes the demand for loans, and the number of lenders or can-be lenders on the other side, which constitutes the supply in the loan market, the rate of interest necessarily goes up. The demand for loans is large; the supply of loanable funds is small. All flush times have been periods of comparative high rates of interest and all dull times have been periods of comparative low rates of interest. In flush times men are seeking to put their energies and money into productive enterprise and are willing to borrow rather than not go in; while in dull times they are seeking to put their money into bonds and stocks and fixed things, where the principal is absolutely safe, but the interest low, because they are afraid of losing it if put in active productive enterprises. There does not exist upon the American continent to-day a place where anybody could borrow money at 40 per cent, as in the olden days, and come out whole—going into a wilderness at that and clearing the forest and building homes. I remember when I borrowed money at 18 per cent and paid off old debts as well as new and laid up money. It was during Cleveland's first Administration—not that his being President had anything to do with it, but I am fixing the date.

The gentleman says that in the silver campaign we cried out for high prices, and that now we are crying out for low prices. The gentleman ought to know the difference between that sort of a high price which is created by a toll, a toll levied upon products in commerce on their way from the producer to the consumer, and that sort of a high price which is created by an abundance of metallic price-fixing money, enabling people to do their business easily. The former sort of high price is created by restriction of the supply, by shutting out goods which would compete for sale. Every restriction of supply makes for scarcity and makes against abundance, and makes, therefore, for poverty and against wealth, because abundance of what men need is wealth, and a scarcity of things needed is poverty for the mass, whatever it may mean for the few; but when the price is high, owing to the fact of an abundance of money (as it was after the discovery of gold in California in the early days, and as it is now to the greatest extent possible (caused by the increased discoveries of gold and owing to cheapened processes of extracting gold ore), then that price is not really an increase in the price of corn as compared with cotton, or an increase in the price of cotton as compared with silk, but it is a decrease simply in the price of money as compared with everything else—as measured in terms of other things, and therefore an increase in the price of everything else as measured in terms of money—and it therefore merely goes to show that money itself is not as high priced as it used to be. This is simply because it is more abundant. Abundance is a blessing; scarcity is a curse. That is the sole difference.

Mr. Chairman, in that connection I will say that, in my opinion, this present ascending scale of prices which has led to this present prosperity not only in the United States, but in Canada and the Argentine and in Mexico and in Germany and all over the world—a degree of prosperity lasting longer than any the world has seen in a long time and greater than any, except that which immediately followed the discovery of gold in California—has been due to the gradually increasing annual crop of gold in this world. This year the gold product will be over $250,000,000. In 1893 it was about $120,000,000. Higher prices have been very largely due not to the condition of things amongst products themselves, but to the fact that the price of money has gone down, and the price of money has gone down because of the increase in the quantity of money, just as the price of wheat would go down because of the increase in the quantity of wheat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why, the very thing that the Democracy contended for in the silver campaign has been justified. Once more I congratulate the gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber. The acceptance of the quantitative theory of money (never disputed except in the early and late nineties) is once more universal. The gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber themselves constantly boast of "the amount of gold circulating in the United States," dragged from the mines of South Africa, from the Klondike, from Colorado, and even got out of silver ores that were formerly thrown upon the dump as useless for gold purposes, but now yielding from 10 to 20 per cent of gold. We of the United States have received more than our proportionate share, owing to our exports, mainly of cotton and grain, neither of which benefits from the protective system. Ah, we asked that legislation should increase the volume of metallic money by adding silver to it; but God, who is kinder to his children than his children's legislators—aye, kinder to them than they are to themselves—answered our prayer by increasing the volume of metallic money in the shape of gold. True, He answered it in a different way, but it was answered. We have received what we asked for—an immensely increased volume of metallic money. Without waiting upon your legislators, prosperity came just as we said prosperity would come if basic money could be increased in volume, and now, like the humbugs you are, you are claiming that that prosperity that exists all over the world, and which is due to the gradually ascending scale of prices that, in its turn is due to an annually increasing volume of metallic, price-fixing gold money, is the result of the passage of the Dingley tariff bill in the United States of America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That ascending scale of prices, encouraging productive enterprise, and the present comparatively high prices will continue how long? It will continue until one of three things happens—either until the annual crop of gold ceases to be an increasing crop, or until productive enterprise shall have caught up with and passed in its demand the supply coming from the increased crop of gold, or until some great national catastrophe or overspeculation upsets all reckonings. So the truth of the quantitative theory of money was never more undeniably demonstrated than now, and that is all we fought for, and was what some of you denied at that time. We lost. Silver as a money is now, and perhaps forever, doomed. But we got, in a different shape, what we fought for. Moreover, paradoxical as it may seem, the fact that we got it rendered our defeat on that particular question permanent. The high price that comes from an abundance of metallic money is wealth itself, as all abundance is; but the high price that comes by subtracting from production a part of itself, by levying a toll or tariff upon it on its way from the producer to the consumer, tends to the restriction of supply, tends to scarcity—raises prices that way, and in that way only. It necessarily therefore tends toward the decrease of the total volume of wealth of the country in which the process takes place. A decrease of wealth is a decrease of the fund out of which wages must be paid, and hence tends to decrease wages. Mr. Chairman, let me read you something upon that subject. I am going to get one of my friends to read it, I am so tired.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I will read it for you.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish you would. This is from Bastiat's Sophisms of Protection, and speaks of "dearness and cheapness." Neither high prices nor low prices are in themselves a blessing or a curse. It depends upon what produces the high price, what produces the low price. If the high price be produced by scarcity of supply, that is not a blessing, but a curse, no matter whether the scarcity of supply is caused by failure of crops or by the artificial restriction of legislation. If the high price is brought about by increase in demand caused by increased purchasing power among the sons and daughters of men, that is a blessing to the community and not a curse. If the low price exists because there is a decrease of demand, because of a cutting off of the purchasing power of the people, that is a curse; but if the low price comes about by cheapened cost of production, by new inventions of things that enable men by the same expenditure of labor to get increased results from that labor, then the low price is a blessing.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky (reading)—

If we wish to judge between freedom of trade and protection, to calculate the probable effect of any political phenomenon, we should notice how far its influence tends to the production of abundance or scarcity, and not simply of cheapness or dearness of price. We must beware of trusting to absolute price; it would lead to inextricable confusion.

Mr. Mathieu de Dombasle, after having established the fact that protection raises prices, adds:

"The augmentation of price increases the expenses of life, and consequently the price of labor, and everyone finds in the increase of the price of his produce the same proportion as in the increase of his expenses. Thus, if everybody pays as consumer, everybody receives also as producer."

It is evident that it would be easy to reverse the argument and say: If everybody receives as producer, everybody must pay as consumer.

Now, what does this prove? Nothing whatever, unless it be that protection transfers riches uselessly and unjustly. Robbery does the same.

Now, I can perfectly well understand that restriction will diminsh the supply of coal, and consequently raise its price; but I do not as clearly see that it increases the demand for labor, thereby raising the rate of wages. This is the less conceivable to me because the sum of labor required depends upon the quantity of disposable capital; and protection, while it may change the direction of capital and transfer from one business to another, can not increase it one penny.

* * * * * * *

All this is nonsense. The simple truth is, that whether men destroy their corn and cloth by fire or by use the effect is the same as regards price but not as regards riches, for it is precisely in the enjoyment of the use that riches—in other words, comfort, well-being—exist.

Protection may in the same way, while it lessens the abundance of things, raise their prices, so as to leave each individual as rich, numerically speaking, as when unembarrassed by it.

* * * * * * *

I must continually repeat that restriction by impeding commerce, by limiting the division of labor, by forcing it to combat difficulties of situation and temperature, must, in its results, diminish the quantity produced by any fixed quantum of labor.

* * * * * * *

Man does not live on nominal values, but on real articles of produce; and the more abundant these articles are, no matter what price they may bear, the richer is he.

I consider it my duty to say a few words in regard to the delusion caused by the words "dear" and "cheap." At the first glance I am aware you may be disposed to find these remarks somewhat subtile, but whether subtile or not the question is whether they are true. For my part I consider them perfectly true and particularly well adapted to cause reflection among a large number of those who cherish a sincere faith in the efficacy of protection.

Whether advocates of free trade or defenders of protection [or advocates of a tariff for revenue, the only constitutional substitute for protectionism in the United States—J. S. W.], we are all obliged to make use of the expression "dearness" and "cheapness."

The former take sides in behalf of cheapness, having in view the interests of consumers. The latter pronounce themselves in favor of dearness, preoccupying themselves solely with the interests of the producer. Others intervene, saying producer and consumer are one and the same, which leaves wholly undecided the question whether cheapness or dearness ought to be the object of legislation.

In this conflict of opinion it seems to me that there is only one position for the law to take—to allow prices to regulate themselves naturally. But the principle of "let alone" has obstinate enemies. They insist upon legislation without even knowing the desired objects of legislation. It would seem, however, to be the duty of those who wish to create high or low prices artificially to state and to substantiate the reasons of their preference. The burden of proof is upon them. Liberty is always considered beneficial until the contrary is proved, and to allow prices naturally to regulate themselves is liberty.

There evidently is a misunderstanding, an illusion, which must be dispelled. This I will endeavor to do.

Suppose two isolated nations, each composed of a million inhabitants. Admit that, other things being equal, one nation had exactly twice as much of everything as the other—twice as much wheat, wine, iron, fuel, books, clothing, furniture, etc. It will be conceded that one will have twice as much wealth as the other.

There is, however, no reason for the statement that the absolute prices are different in the two nations. They possibly may be higher in the wealthiest nation. It may happen that in the United States everything is nominally dearer than in Poland, and that, nevertheless, the people there are less generally supplied with everything; by which it may be seen that the abundance of products, and not the absolute price, constitutes wealth. In order, then, accurately to compare free trade and protection the inquiry should not be which of the two causes high prices or low prices, but which of the two produces abundance or scarcity.

For observe this: Products are exchanged, the one for the other, and a relative scarcity and a relative abundance leave the absolute price exactly at the same point, but not so the condition of men.

Let us look into the subject a little further.

* * * * * * *

There are two causes for high prices, and not one merely.

The same is true of low prices. One of the best established principles of political economy is that price is determined by the law of supply and demand.

The price is then affected by two conditions—the demand and the supply. These conditions are necessarily subject to variation. The relations of demand to supply may be exactly counterbalanced, or may be greatly disproportionate, and the variations of price are almost interminable.

Prices rise either on account of augmented demand or diminished supply.

They fall by reason of an augmentation of the supply or a diminution of the demand.

Consequently there are two kinds of dearness and two kinds of cheapness. There is a bad dearness, which results from a diminution of the supply; for this implies scarcity and privation. There is a good dearness—that which results from an increase of demand, for this indicates the augmentation of the general wealth.

There is also a good cheapness, resulting from abundance. And there is a baneful cheapness—such as results from the cessation of demand, the inability of consumers to purchase.

And observe this: Prohibition [the author uses the word as synonymous with "protection"—J. S. W.] causes at the same time both the dearness and the cheapness which are of a bad nature; a bad dearness, resulting from a diminution of the supply (this, indeed, is its avowed object), and a bad cheapness, resulting from a diminution of the demand, because it gives a false direction to capital and labor and overwhelms consumers with taxes and restrictions.

So that, as regards the price, these two tendencies may neutralize each other; and, for this reason, the protective system, restricting the supply and the demand at the same time, does not always realize the high prices which are its object.

But with respect to the condition of the people these two tendencies do not neutralize each other; on the contrary, they unite in impoverishing them.

The effect of free trade is exactly the opposite.

Possibly it does not cause [and in a lesser degree of tariff for revenue only—J. S. W.] the cheapness which it promises, for it also has two tendencies—the one toward that desirable form of cheapness resulting from the increase of supply, or from abundance; the other toward that dearness consequent upon the increased demand and the development of the general wealth.

These two tendencies may neutralize themselves as regards the mere price; but they concur in their tendency to ameliorate the condition of mankind. In a word, under the protective system men recede toward a condition of feebleness as regards both supply and demand.

Price is not a good criterion of wealth. It might continue the same when society had relapsed into the most abject misery or had advanced to a high state of prosperity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, in another part of this book there is a letter which Bastiat wrote to a protectionist who was supposed to have written to him questioning this double operation of this natural law. Here it is:

MY DEAR PROTECTIONIST: We say that the end and aim of your restrictive measures is a wrongful one—artificial dearness. But we do not say that they always realize the hopes of those who initiate them. It is certain that they inflict on the consumer all the evils of dearness. It is not certain that the producer gets the profit. Why? Because if they diminish the supply they also diminish the demand.

This proves that in the economical arrangement of this world there is a moral force, a vis medicatrix, which in the long run causes inordinate ambition to become the prey of a delusion.

You gentlemen see that if this supply be diminished by prohibition of imports, that pari passu with the degree and the length of the prohibition the price goes up, and then that the effective demand necessarily is also diminished, because there are fewer people who can buy at the higher price. But to continue the reading of the letter to My Dear Protectionist:

Pray, notice, sir, that one of the elements of the prosperity of each special branch of industry is the general prosperity. The rent of a house is not merely in proportion to what it has cost, but also to the number and means of the tenants. Do two houses which are precisely alike necessarily rent for the same sum? Certainly not, if one is in Paris and the other in Lower Brittany. Let us never speak of a price without regarding the conditions, and let us understand that there is nothing more futile than to try to build the prosperity of the parts on the ruin of the whole. This is the attempt of the restrictive system.

Competition always has been, and always will be, disagreeable to those who are affected by it. Thus we see that in all times and in all places men try to get rid of it. We know, and you too, perhaps, a municipal council where the resident merchants make a furious war on the foreign ones. Their projectiles are import duties, fines, etc., etc.

Now, just think what would have become of Paris, for instance, if this war had been carried on there with success.

Suppose that the first shoemaker who settled there had succeeded in keeping out all others, and that the first tailor, the first mason, the first printer, the first watchmaker, the first hairdresser, the first physician, the first baker had been equally fortunate. Paris would still be a village with twelve or fifteen hundred inhabitants. But it was not thus. Each one, except those whom you still keep away, came to make money in this market, and that is precisely what has built it up. It has been a long series of collisions for the enemies of competition, and from one collision after another Paris has become a city of a million inhabitants. The general prosperity has gained by this, doubtless, but have the shoemakers and tailors, individually, lost anything by it? For you, this is the question. As competitors came, you said: "The price of boots will fall." Has it been so? No; for if the supply has increased, the demand has increased also.

Thus will it be with cloth; therefore let it come in. It is true that you will have more competitors, but you will also have more customers and richer ones. Did you never think of this when seeing nine-tenths of your countrymen deprived during the winter of that superior cloth that you make?

This is not a very long lesson to learn. If you wish to prosper, let your customers do the same.

When this is once known, each one will seek his welfare in the general welfare. Then jealousies between individuals, cities, provinces, and nations will no longer vex the world.

Now, the next thing that is noteworthy which was said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] was that "the people less than two years ago indorsed" the present position of the Republican party. Now, Mr. Chairman, was it that? Or was it an ill-founded confidence—ill-founded as it now turns out—that the Republican party would observe that other plank of its platform, to wit, the promise to revise the tariff "to meet changed conditions" and to have that revisal "by its friends?" Now, I say that that promise, together with the personality of your President, was what you won upon. Indeed, you were nearly everywhere throughout the campaign apologizing for the present existing rates of the Dingley bill and were making promises to the people all over this land that you yourselves would revise the tariff; that it was well that you should do it, because you were "the friends of the tariff," and that if we did it we would "destroy the principle," as you call it, of protectionism, while you would "retain the principle" and still change the bad schedules.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa comes into this forum of American legislation and politics, after having won upon a pretext like that, and states that the very confidence of the people in the fact that you would keep your promise is the reason why you should not keep your promise and why you are not keeping it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If you attempt it next year it will be too late to do you much good, because by that time the American people, who are not fools, will have seen that it is we who have driven you to the work if you do it at all. If your President urges you by message to do it, you will plead "No time at a short session," and the people will know that your President's message and your plea are alike humbug and pretense and a specious trick to win one more election. Then they will say that you have not kept the promise that you made to them after the last election and they do not believe you will keep the new one if you win the next. In either event, I tell you, verily you are now between the devil and the deep blue sea, and there are some of you who will go to the deep blue sea and some who will go [great laughter]—to the other horn of the dilemma [renewed laughter], and some of you who will take to the woods so as to avoid both sides of it. [Laughter and applause.]

I have run over about all of the speech of the gentleman from Iowa that amounted to anything, except when he stood Ajax-like defying proof—proof that rails were sold abroad cheaper than the same manufacturers at the same time sold them at home.

I do not want that proposition to be disputed any more; and I am going to proceed to prove it as to rails and many other things by putting in proof that can not be questioned. I am going, first, to read from the Report of the Merchant Marine Commission, volume 3, page 77, at the bottom of that page, the testimony of Mr. Nixon, a shipbuilder known to all the world as a man of character, who answers the following question from Senator MALLORY, who was examining him, in the following way:

Senator MALLORY. There is another question. Some years ago we were shipping steel plates to the Clyde. As I remember, we had some very good evidence to that effect before Congress. Quite a large contract was made, and it was said that we were underselling the British steel-plate makers on their own ground. Do you remember whether or not that was correct? That was about four or five years ago.

PRICES OF MATERIALS.

Mr. NIXON. I heard the statement at the time. I have no doubt that some contracts were placed in this country. I merely had to take the statement as I saw it printed. I had no connection with it.

Senator MALLORY. Since then these plates have gone up so that at the present time there is about one-third difference?

Mr. NIXON. They are selling approximately at $38 a ton here as against $31 there. But that is the price here for American materials. Undoubtedly American material can be bought in England very much more cheaply than here at present.

The italics are mine.

Now, on page 79 of the same volume, Representative MCDERMOTT, of New Jersey, questioning him:

Representative MCDERMOTT. Your proposition is this: American plates can be sold abroad, or are sold abroad, for some business reason, at a less price than they are sold here?

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

Representative MCDERMOTT. Plates of equal quality, but of foreign manufacture, can be imported for less than you can buy domestic plates here?

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON. Can the gentleman give the date of that testimony?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have given you the page and volume of the hearings of the Merchant Marine Commission. It was in 1905, at the hearing held in New York City, beginning on May 23.

Now, my friend from Texas [Mr. GILLESPIE] has been kind enough to make up a statement of the various other portions of this record of the Merchant Marine Commission hearings where witnesses testify to the same effect. He cites the pages, and I shall ask leave to read a part of it and insert the balance in the RECORD. I want now to thank my friend for having done that for me, for I have so much work to do of various sorts it is really a need to have such help.

After hearing this testimony you will conclude with me that there is, else there seems to be, much, repeated, and long-continued "dumping."

Our manufacturers seem to have contracted the habit of "dumping" as a rule of business.

The so-called "surplus" is very nearly, if not quite, annual.

The trust "surplus" is only what can not be sold in America at sheltered market exploitation prices.

Mr. A. A. Moss (p. 1722, vol. 3): I believe that the steel trust is responsible to a great extent in discriminating against the American shipbuilder in the way of prices, as plates and other material made by the American steel trust are shipped to England and sold at 25 to 33 per cent less than they can be had in this country.

Mr. McGregor (p. 782, vol. 2): I picked up a newspaper in the month of February and read as a piece of news that one of the independent steel companies, not in the trust, in Pennsylvania, had just sold 40,000 tons of steel rails to the Canadian Pacific Railroad at $21.50 per ton. * * * You remember that when Congressman Johnson was in the House he made the statement, as a steel manufacturer, that he could make steel rails at a profit of $2 per ton and deliver them on the cars at Johnstown, on the Cambria Works, at $18.50. That statement is on record in Congress, and it is not disputed. * * * Oh, they did contradict him, but the question here for us, I think, gentlemen, is, Did they successfully contradict him? Because he was at that time one of the largest manufacturers of steel rails in the United States. As a manufacturer of steel rails, he simply took his books and showed that he paid higher wages than any other concern in the trust, and he was then a member of the steel trust. Those are facts on record.

The above statement was made before the Commission June 27, 1904.

Mr. James C. Wallace, of the American Shipbuilding Company, on June 28, 1904, gave this testimony before the Commission:

* * * Recently one of our largest steel mills sold abroad 100,000 tons of steel plate. They delivered it, I understand, at Belfast at $24 per ton. That would practically mean, with ocean rates as they are, $22 a ton at tide water. They are charging us to-day at Pittsburg $32 per ton. About four years ago our company took a contract from the American Navigation Company for building here on the Lakes two 7,000-ton ocean ships. * * * We took the contract at a price about equal to the price for which they could be built in England at that time. Steel was then very much lower than it is to-day. Steel pools had not then been formed.

Representative GROSVENOR. I want to know who bought the steel you speak of?

Mr. WALLACE. The Harland & Wolfe Company.

Representative GROSVENOR. From whom did they buy it?

Mr. WALLACE. The United States Steel Corporation.

Representative GROSVENOR. Do you know where it was shipped from?

Mr. WALLACE. I do not. I presume from the Carnegie Steel Company. I do not know that, though, for a fact, as they have so many mills.

Representative GROSVENOR. And their present price to you is $32?

Mr. WALLACE. Thirty-two dollars a ton, Pittsburg.

Representative GROSVENOR. And that was laid down at Belfast at $22?

Mr. WALLACE. At $24.

The CHAIRMAN. What does it cost to transport it from this country to Ireland?

Mr. WALLACE. As near as I understand, the rates at the present time are $2 a ton. That would be $22 a ton at tide water. * * *

Representative GROSVENOR. What is the freight from Pittsburg to tide water?

Mr. WALLACE. I think it is about $1.40 a ton. I am not positive about that, though.

Mayor JOHNSON. That would make $11.40 difference between the Pittsburg price to you and the price abroad?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes. I am not positive about just what that rate is. * * *

Representative MINOR. Mr. Wallace, would there be the same difference between all material that goes into your frames—your shapes, I suppose?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Representative MINOR. Beams, rivets, etc.—would the same difference be maintained between the cost in Europe and the cost here?

Mr. WALLACE. It is so to-day. Plates, beams, angles, and channels are now $32 per ton, Pittsburg. * * *

Mr. GOULDEN. Is the price as low abroad on other things as it is on the plate?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir. Roll prices are the same at the present time.

Representative MINOR. Do they lay that down in England at the present time at that price?

Mr. WALLACE. Twenty-four dollars a ton in Belfast. They made no secret of it. It was published in the papers at the time.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. I presume that in the instance you have cited as to the sale of steel abroad, you have taken the pains to verify it beyond peradventure?

Mr. WALLACE. It was given to me by the assistant sales agent of the Carnegie Steel Company.

Senator PENROSE. Was any reason given for the difference in price?

Mr. WALLACE. Nothing but that they wanted to keep their mills in operation.

Representative MINOR. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the testimony of Mr. Edwin S. Cramp is about the same as that of Mr. Wallace on prices abroad and here.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; I think it is. I want to say what I think I am privileged to say, as chairman of this Commission, that, if the situation is as has been described, it is a great outrage. [Applause.]

Mr. WALLACE. We have thought so for some time, and we have thought that in some way it ought to be remedied.

The above testimony of Mr. Wallace appears on pages 811, 812, 813, and 814, volume 2 of the report.

One of the witnesses—McGregor, I believe—says, as you will remember:

When Mr. Tom Johnson, of Ohio, was in the House, himself a steel-rail manufacturer, he made the statement that he could, with a profit of $2 a ton, deliver rails on board of the cars at the Cambria Works, Johnstown, at $18.50. That statement is in the RECORD, in Congress, and is not disputed. They undertook to contradict him, but he was not successfully contradicted. At that time he was one of the largest manufacturers of steel rails in the United States.

By the way, I will stop to say that Tom Johnson may be a single taxer and all that, but if there is a man with a much higher sense of honor and of more absolute veracity and truth that I have ever met personally than Tom Johnson I am not certain who he is.

The witness went on:

As a manufacturer of steel rails, he simply took his books and showed that he paid higher wages than any other concern in the trust.

He was then a member of the steel trust, which he confessed. My friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will remember, as I do, the incident. When somebody twitted Tom Johnson about it, he in substance said:

Yes, it is a bad law; it is a mean law; the duty ought to be removed; but do you think when I am in the business that I am going to be a fool and not get my share of the profit while it is going on? Of course I joined the trust, and I am working under the system as long as I am in the business.

Now, that statement I have just quoted was made before the Commission June 27, 1904. Mr. James C. Wallace, of the American shipbuilding concern, on June 28, 1904, gave this testimony, which I have cited:

Recently one of our largest steel mills sold abroad 100,000 tons of steel plate. They delivered it at Belfast at $24 per ton. That would practically mean, with ocean rates as they are, $22 a ton at tide water. They are charging us to-day at Pittsburg $32 per ton.

That is a difference of $10 in favor of the foreign shipbuilder.

And here comes in the gentleman from Ohio, General GROSVENOR, and wants us to take out of the money of the poor, out of the pockets of the poor sewing women of this country, who wear the goods that are taxed by the tariff, and out of the pockets of the dentists and the doctors and the preachers and the farm laborers, and the darkies in my field, who are harming nobody, and from everybody else—money to compensate the American shipbuilders for the amount that they lose by the tariff-enabled robbery of the American steel trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why not deprive the steel trust of its "big stick"—of its power to rob?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it pertinent to this?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. I should like to ask the gentleman when the American steel trust sold 40,000 tons of steel rails to the Canadian government for $21.50 a ton? What year was that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. You mean what I have quoted from McGregor's statement?

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Yes; or when did any independent steel company do that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This testimony was given on June 28, 1904, and the witness says that "recently" it was done. That is as near as I can come to it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement made upon this floor by Mr. Lind of Minnesota, a Member of the last Congress and a man of the highest personal integrity and veracity. It is the statement of a matter of his own knowledge.

I was out on the Pacific coast for a couple of weeks just before I came down here, and I learned of an occurrence that impressed the situation with reference to our iron and steel schedule on my mind in a greater degree than anything that has yet come to my notice.

As you all know, there is an immense packing industry on the Pacific coast. A great deal of tin plate is used in that industry. There is also a large demand for sheet steel and sheet iron for Alaska. On the trip referred to I learned what I am now about to state. I am not going to give names, but what I shall say is capable of verification by anyone who is curious. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company, to which I shall refer, will give you the data and the facts.

A firm in Portland, Oreg., dealing in hardware and handling large quantities of tin plate and sheet steel found that they needed some six or seven carloads of such material. This was about a year ago last summer. They wrote to Pittsburg, the only place where those commodities could be bought, to one of the subsidiary companies of the steel trust, and received quotations. These people at Portland found that the price made by the Pittsburg company was exorbitant, that it left no profit to them on the basis of the contracts that they had entered into, so they sent up to Vancouver, a thriving town just over the Canadian line, I think within 15 miles of the United States boundary, and they procured a firm of Canadian brokers to write to the same concern a letter similar to that which they had sent, to ascertain at what prices they could buy these seven carloads of tin plate and sheet steel.

The Canadians were given quotations ranging from eight to eleven dollars per ton less than the quotations to the American applicants. At the instance of the Portland firm the Canadian brokers immediately ordered the tin plate and the sheet steel. In due course of time the orders were filled and the bills of lading, with drafts annexed, were sent to the bank at Vancouver. Those of you who are at all familiar with dealings in that kind of commodities know that the manufacturer usually advances the freight, directs the route of shipment, and sends draft with bill of lading. These cars had been routed from Pittsburg to Chicago, from Chicago to St. Paul via the Burlington road, and from St. Paul to the Pacific via the Northern Pacific Railroad.

In due time, as I say, the bills of lading, with drafts attached, arrived in Vancouver, and the Vancouver brokers promptly paid the drafts, indorsed the bills of lading, and sent them to their Portland customers.

They immediately put themselves in communication with the Northern Pacific Railroad and found that the cars were in transit somewhere in North Dakota. They demanded that the cars should be diverted, so as to be sent—three to Portland, two to Seattle, one to Tacoma, and one to another point, I think, instead of being carried through to Vancouver. They had the title papers—the bills of lading—indorsed; the drafts duly receipted. The railroad company could do nothing else than comply with the demand, and the cars were diverted, and this clever Portland firm saved about $3,000 by the transaction.

Mr. HAMILTON. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he knew that that statement of Mr. Wallace which he quoted was contradicted by Judge Gary before the Merchant Marine Committee on April 11?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I did, and I have an article here from the Washington Post, that I will ask to have read now, in answer to the gentleman's question. Yes; I knew it was contradicted by this Gary. The shipbuilders were seeking a ship subsidy, and they came here giving various reasons why they ought to have it, and one of them was that the American steel producers were charging them more than they were charging the foreigner; and then the "system," as Lawson calls it, began to find out that this thing might cut both ways—that is, that it might hurt the steel trust or revive tariff agitation—and lo and behold, they sent for "witnesses." Gary came in to break the force of Wallace's testimony.

Mr. HAMILTON. Before that is read, inasmuch as the gentleman has asked that the editorial from the Post be read, may I quote the language of Judge Gary?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; you may not, because all he did was to contradict it. I have already declined to yield for that purpose. I decline again to yield.

Read that article, Mr. Clerk.

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to ask you——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have declined to yield to the gentleman any further.

Mr. HAMILTON. His testimony is better than the statement of the Washington Post.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have said that a part of what he said is quoted from him in the Washington Post.

Mr. HAMILTON. Oh, very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONFLICTING CONGRESSIONAL "HEARINGS."

Before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was fairly through with the "hearings" on the ship subsidy, it proceeded to allow "hearings" in vindication of the steel trust. In the hearings granted to the shipmasters it was deposed and reiterated that the steel trust sold material for building ships to foreigners for considerably less than the same was sold to Americans. That fact was emphasized in the testimony of numerous witnesses, and it is one of the "conclusive arguments" with which Congress is deluged.

But those "arguments" are for subsidy only. The steel trust was much concerned, for it is manifest that the American people will put the enemies of protection to reforming the tariff if its office be for the benefit of foreigners, affording them lower prices for American goods than is exacted of the American customer; and so the steel trust came to town and demanded a "hearing."

* * * * * * *

One of the head men of the steel trust—a Mr. Gary—appeared before the committee and said it was all a mistake—that there was no considerable difference in the domestic prices of steel products and the export prices. That was news to the committee, and it is news to the country. If it be true, there has been some tall lying done in this vicinity the past half a dozen years, and we hope the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries will persist in holding most exhaustive "hearings" on the subject, and not be satisfied with anything short of the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

Mr. Gary volunteered this information: The home price of steel rails in Canada is $33 a ton, in Germany it is $30, in France it is $31, in Austria it is $31, in Belgium it is $30, in Great Britain it is $31.50, while in the United States the price is $28 a ton.

Now, the question naturally and inevitably obtrudes, What is the use of exorbitant duties to protect the cheapest steel rails in the world from the dearer rails of other countries?

No doubt that can be satisfactorily explained at a Congressional "hearing."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, you will note that Mr. Gary is one of the magnates of the steel trust, and therefore his testimony is, at the best, "suspect."

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD, as a part of his speech, the fact that he does not want Mr. Gary's answer to Mr. Wallace's statement?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that sort of a thing is unworthy of the gentleman from Michigan. I surely need not repeat for the third time my declination. Now, I will go ahead. In the next place I will read a letter which was written by Mr. Schwab on May 15, 1899, and you all know that Mr. Schwab was then and is now, I suppose, connected with the Carnegie-Frick steel trust. This was published first in the Indianapolis News and was reproduced by Senator BACON, from whom I read it as quoted. It was written by Mr. Schwab to Mr. Frick, and bears date of May 15, 1899. It is a "heart-to-heart talk" between two steel magnates, with no intention of fooling the public and no idea that the letter would become public. He says:

As to the future, even on low prices, I am most sanguine. I know positively that England can not produce pig iron at the actual cost for less than $11.50 a ton, even allowing no profit on raw materials, and can not put pig iron into a rail with their most efficient work for less than $7.50 a ton. This would make rails at net cost to them at $19. We can sell at this price and ship abroad so as to net us $16 at works for foreign business, nearly as good as home business has been. What is true of rails is equally true of other steel products. As a result of this we are going to control the steel business of the world. You know we can make steel rails for less than $12 a ton, leaving a nice margin on foreign business. Besides this, foreign costs are going to increase year by year because they have not the raw material, while ours is going to decrease. The result of all this is that we will be able to sell our surplus abroad, run our works full all the time, and get the best practice and costs in this way.

Senator BACON well adds:

There is a concrete instance from which, by the testimony of Mr. Schwab himself, it appears that while rails are selling at $28 a ton in the United States he alleges that he can deliver them in England at a cost that will compete with the English rails at $16 a ton, and that that is $4 a ton above what it will cost him to do it—even at that rate he would have $4 a ton profit.

If Mr. Schwab knows his own business—and he has never been accused of not knowing it—our steel makers have the capacity to "dump" steel on Europe forever at a profit now and at an increasing profit from year to year.

"While our surplus abroad sells at a profit of $4 a ton." What sort of a surplus? Surplus produced by the high prices fixed in the American market. If he had reduced the price at which he sold the goods in the American market to the same price as that at which he sold them in the English market or to a price nearly the same, but higher even, there would have been no "surplus."

Now, here is a letter written by J. T. Wright, a native of the State of Indiana, a Republican, dated February 23, 1904, and addressed to Senator BACON, parts of which I am going to read:

MACON, GA., February 23, 1904.

Hon. A. O. BACON, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I beg to own receipt of yours of the 20th, and have carefully noted same.

I recall very distinctly my conversation with you on the subject of steel rails purchased by my company from the ——— company, and I take pleasure in giving you the details of the transaction, asking you, however, to refrain from mentioning the names of the parties.

The extension of our road, some 40 miles, was decided upon and cash provided for it early in the spring of 1901. Owing to the demand at that time for steel in all forms and the probability of the advance in price, it seemed wise to take up the matter of the purchase of the necessary rails at once. Inquiries therefore were addressed and mailed to all the leading steel-rail manufacturers in the country asking for tenders on the 60 miles of 70-pound steel rail delivered at Savannah or Macon, the point of delivery to be optional with us.

We received prompt responses, but there was practically no difference in the bids, the eastern rail mills contiguous to tide water quoting practically the same price delivered at Savannah and a correspondingly higher price for Macon delivery, the interior rail mills making a lower price for Macon delivery and a higher price for Savannah delivery. It was very evident to me that the field had been divided by the manufacturers and that no one of them would encroach upon the territory assigned to the others.

After endeavoring in vain to obtain better prices than those quoted, we finally accepted the bid of the ——— Steel Company and placed our order with them for 5,618 tons of rail at $29 per ton based upon delivery at tide water. This would enable us to arrange our own freight rate to Savannah and effect some saving in the cost of the rails. The order was declined on these terms, the ——— Steel Company refusing to make any price f. o. b. mill, but insisting upon delivered price.

I made one more effort. Some friends of mine were interested in a railroad project in Central America, and I broached the subject to the representative of the ——— Steel Company, who had come here to close the matter with me. I told him that my friends had made some inquiry of me as to the cost of construction in that country, and I should like to know at what price he would sell me steel rails delivered at tide water for shipment to Honduras. He promptly quoted me $20 per ton. Further inquiry developed the fact, however, that they would only load vessels chartered to a foreign port, and that the charter should be an essential part of the contract. The wall was complete. There was nothing left for me to do but to place my order and to thank God it was no worse; so within two days thereafter steel rails advanced $2 per ton.

Allowing a liberal amount for cost of delivery at tide water, which in this particular case would have been very small, we American citizens paid to this American industry $33,000 in excess of what foreigners would have been compelled to pay. And $33,000 would have put up a very handsome library filled with standard books on protection.

And this was a very small transaction—only 50 miles of railroad. Payments were cash, and we neither needed nor asked any concessions in the matter of time. Because we were Americans, interested in the development of a small section of our country, involving faith and sacrifices, we were compelled to pay out as a bonus in excess of $600 per mile.

But they "would only load vessels chartered to a foreign port"—had to be certain the $20 a ton steel was going abroad; growing suspicious of people "buying for export"—afraid they might buy for export and then lay the rails on American soil!

The same steel-rail makers quoting the same rails to the same man at the same time at $29 at tide water if to be laid on our soil, and at $20 at the mill if to be laid in Central America! That ought to satisfy the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. Wright closes this letter, by the way, by saying that "if the statement is of any use to you, I shall be glad, as an American and as a Republican." Now, this is not speculation; this is from the man who was president of the railroad which negotiated for the rails, and he himself did the negotiating and the buying. What was the name of the railroad?

Mr. BARTLETT. The Macon, Dublin and Savannah Railroad. I want to say that I know Mr. Wright personally and his statement is absolutely entitled to the credit of any gentleman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not like to bore the House too much, but I want to read from a letter written by W. G. Raoul to Senator BACON, of Georgia, and dated February 25, 1904. It is necessary for me to tell you who Mr. Raoul is. He is president of the National Railroad Company of Mexico, or was when he wrote this letter, and I suppose still is. The National Railroad Company of Mexico is owned by Englishmen, in the main, and the president is a railroad man from the State of Georgia. He had formerly been president of the Central Railroad of Georgia. This Mexican National is a long railroad, extending from Laredo, Tex., to the City of Mexico—840 miles. It runs through the soil of Mexico and of our own country.

Now, this is the statement of Mr. Raoul in that letter. He says:

In 1902 I secured bids on steel rails for Mexico from the United States mills for about $24, delivered at Tampico—

What the freight was from Pittsburg to Tampico I, of course, do not know, but it must have been $3 or $4 a ton. He says, as I have read:

In 1902 I secured bids on steel rails for Mexico from the United States mills for about $24, delivered at Tampico, while the price I paid at the same time for rails for our road in Texas was $28 at the mill.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

That ought to satisfy the gentleman from Iowa. That must have made the price about $30 or $31 when the rails were landed, after paying freight at the Texas points, along the line of railroad. He goes on:

I have understood that the Canadian Pacific has just bought a large lot of rails from the United States Steel Corporation at $21. It is asserted and denied that the $21 is for delivery at Montreal. If it is, the price at the mill would be about $19, while the price for United States roads is still $28 at the mill. I do not know this of my own knowledge, and it is mere current rumor.

So these goods are sold certainly at $21 a ton mill price for those of the rails to be laid on Mexican soil, and possibly lower than that, and at the same time they were sold at $28 to the same railway for so much of the rails as were to be laid on American soil. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I have not heard of the companies in the steel trust or any of their officials having been prosecuted, yet I saw yesterday where they had met and solemnly "fixed the price" of steel rails at $28 for the next year or two. Of course, there is no "combination in restraint of trade" among them—God forbid!—else the President would enforce the law.

On April 25–26, in the Senate, Senator BACON, of Georgia, refers to the results of the investigations of a well-known American:

In a recent pamphlet Mr. Henry Loomis Nelson, former editor of Harper's Weekly, shows the utter fallacy of the assertion, so frequently made, that the trusts have reduced prices. He shows, for instance, that the average yearly "base" price of wire nails per keg has increased since 1894 from $1.11 to $2.60, the present price being $3.53, and the price of barbed wire from $1.80 in 1897 to $3.17 in 1899, the present price being $4.13. The profits of the trust run from $8,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year, the increase of price being nearly all profit. It has, however, by its increase of prices greatly reduced the consumption of wire fencing, and in 1896 the consumption of cut and wire nails was reduced by a former trust about 1,000,000 kegs. While the trust raises the price of its goods to the American farmer and mechanic, it sells to the foreigner for much less. In 1896, for example, the price of nails to foreigners was $1.30 and to Americans $2.70. In 1898 the retail price to Americans was about $4.50 and to foreigners $2.14 "base," or about $3.10 retail, a keg. It was possible to buy at export price, ship the goods to Europe, bring them back, and even then undersell the trust's domestic prices. In 1899 the trust exported 51,000,000 pounds of wire nails to its former foreign customers and 215,000,000 pounds of wire.

During the last campaign, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party hoped that there was going to be a real issue made about this very matter. They therefore collected from trade journals in this country all the information on the subject that they could. The New York World published for the committee an offer, which was made to people generally, to bring in these trade journals with their export prices. Those trade journals were brought in and they are at Democratic headquarters and can be seen by anybody. I furnish you the first list from the American Export Monthly of June 18, 1904, published by Arkle & Douglas at 5 to 11 Broadway, New York City. The Douglas of this firm was the Hon. William Harris Douglas, a Republican Representative from the Fifteenth Congressional district of New York. The second table, which is taken from that same paper, I insert following the first.

FIRST TABLE.—Showing differences in discounts from price lists for foreign and home consumers and the per cent of difference between export and home prices; many varieties and sizes are often included under one discount.

NOTE.—Where several discounts are quoted the first figure is the discount from list price, the second figure is the discount from the remainder, the third figure is the discount from that remainder, and so on. Thus, in the line for "Augers" below, the home discount is given as "50, 10, 5." If the list price was $1 these discounts would mean 50 per cent off from $1 (50 cents), less 10 per cent of remainder (5 cents), less 5 per cent of that remainder (2½ cents), leaving 42½ cents as net price to buyer.

In February, 1904, the literary bureau of the Democratic Congressional committee received a letter from Henry Rossell & Co. (Limited), Sheffield, England, large manufacturers and dealers in files and tool steel. This letter says:

"As an illustration of the unfair manner in which home buyers of files are treated by the United States manufacturers, I inclose you herewith a comparison of the prices charged to the buyers in the United States with those offered by the same manufacturers here."

Some of the prices on the list inclosed follow:

From these figures we see that the American File Association, which has not revised its price list to American buyers since November 1, 1899, is charging us for most kinds of its small files more than twice as much as it charges Englishmen for these same files, and for half-round files we must pay them three times the price charged Englishmen.

Let us see what a great trade journal in sympathy with the steel makers, when not talking politics but giving the news of the trade to the trade, says:

On November 12, 1903, the Iron Age quoted American bars in England at 82 shillings, or less than $20 per ton, and in America at $1.42½, or $31.92 per ton. Thus the independent manufacturer of tin plate in America, who has to buy his bars of the steel trust, must pay more than 50 per cent more for his chief raw material than is paid by his foreign competitor. This is "protection to home industries" with a vengeance.

The same number of the Iron Age tells us that American steel beams, plates, angles, channels, and rivet steel are being sold in Canada at from $9 to $11 per ton less than the prices charged here.

The Iron Age of December 17 enumerated a great number of articles of American make which sold largely in South Africa. Nearly all are sold there at prices far below those charged here. Thus it appears that shovels, which our shovel trust sells here at 90 cents each, are sold there at 36½ cents. This Iron Age also contains information showing that United States Steel Corporation was, early in January, offering steel billets in Lanarkshire, England, at 75 shillings per ton. Deducting $5 for freight and other transportation costs, the trust gets about $14 per ton for billets for export, while its price to American consumers is $23.

Now the testimony of a newspaper which is the authority for bankers and business men; on July 30, 1904, the New York Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin contained the following:

One of the most interesting features of the steel situation is an important sale of several thousand tons of steel plates for export, the price of £5 delivered at Newcastle-on-the-Tyne netting the mills about 90 cents per net ton, f. o. b. Pittsburg. It should be remembered that sales are made in the English market by the gross ton; allowing $3.50 freight rates and a slight allowance for insurance, this price would net the mills $20 gross, or $1.80 per net ton, or 90 cents per hundred, against $1.60 per hundred for domestic business.

The following is from the August, 1900, report of the Bureau of Statistics on commerce and finance. There is much good sense in it. It proves, first, that this "dumping" was then, as it is now, no dumping at all, but a fixed and profitable export business; and, second, that even Republican Government employees see and are forced to take note of the fact and its cause. The italics are mine. It likewise shows what chiefly ails our merchant marine, and points a cheaper way to its revival than taxing the poor on what they consume in order to subsidize it out of the people's Treasury:

The progress of work on shipbuilding in the United States has likewise been retarded, because makers of steel materials required a higher price from the American consumers than they did from the foreign consumers for substantially similar products. Of course, American exporters have to get foreign contracts in competition with foreign plate makers, who are excluded from our domestic market. In addition to this, American export plate makers are interested in preventing the establishment of plate manufacturing in their customer nations abroad, and to that end bid low enough to discourage foreign nations from entering the field for producing their own plate at home. The progress of domestic manufactures of iron and steel goods may likewise be handicapped by the sale of iron and steel in their manufactured state at so much lower a price to foreigners than to domestic consumers as to keep the American competitor out of foreign markets generally. The natural limit to such a policy of maintaining a higher level of prices for these materials at home than abroad is found in the restriction of domestic consumption and the import duty. If restriction of consumption at home does not operate to prevent the short-sighted policy of discrimination against domestic development of manufacturing industries, the other contingency is more or less sure to rise, namely, the demand for the reduction of the tariff on unfinished iron and steel, in order to equalize the opportunity of makers of finished products in foreign markets. To this policy the domestic consumer is usually ready to lend himself, thus making a powerful combination of interests to set limits to the rise of domestic prices of iron and steel materials.

Of the two policies open to iron and steel makers, the far-sighted one of keeping the domestic and foreign markets as near as possible on a par in the price of these materials of manufacture seems by far the wiser one to follow, both in the interest of a steadier course of prices, which means steadier consumption, and on account of the competition of manufacturers of finished goods with foreign manufacturers in the neutral markets of the world.

The other policy of maintaining prices to manufacturers at the highest level at home leaves little margin for experiment in seeking new markets, and restricts the application of iron and steel to additional uses at home. The depressing effects of an agitation for tariff revision to remedy this inequality are sure to cause a far greater business loss, not only to the country as a whole, but to the producers of iron and steel themselves, than is to be gained by selling at low prices abroad, which they can not help, and at high prices at home, which they can help. Nor can the home-market price be sustained beyond certain limits by export sales. Certain American manufacturers of steel materials tried this policy up to April, 1900. It resulted in a very positive shrinkage in domestic consumption at the then high rates. Farmers had ceased to purchase barbed wire for wire fences, retail hardware dealers had complained for months of diminished business in nails and wire. Jobbers had gotten in the way of doing a hand-to-mouth business on prices that had advanced from $1.35 to $3.20 in the course of a year. Hence the reduction of $1 in April, 1900, became a necessity in order to keep the mills in operation.

If steel rails, for example, sell at Pittsburg for $35 per ton for months in succession for home consumption, while the foreign consumer is purchasing them for $22 to $24 per ton, the domestic market is sure to order no more than it is obliged to have for the time being.

Note the words which I have italicized, forming the last sentence. What an apt practical illustration of Bastiat's natural law, of the sort of high prices which kill by choking demand! A Republican "Daniel come to judgment" is this.

I shall now ask my friend Mr. TOWNE, who has a better voice than I, to read what is said by Secretary Shaw on page 19 of the Republican Campaign Text-Book of 1904, and which contains an admission by Senator GALLINGER of the "True, but it is nothing-but-a-colt-and-the-colt-of-a-yellow-Mexican-pony" class.

Mr. TOWNE read as follows:

Our opponents lay much stress upon the fact that some American manufactures are sold abroad cheaper than at home. Our friends sometimes deny this, and they sometimes apologize for it, and a few in times past have downed our opponents in recommending a removal of tariff from all such articles. It is useless to deny, in my judgment, unwise to apologize, and a little short of foolishness to attempt to remedy the assumed evil in the manner proposed by the opposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I stop the reading at this point for a moment to express a wonder if the present Secretary of the Treasury, being from Iowa, would have used that unparliamentary term "foolish" if he had known it was going to apply on day before yesterday to the dean of the Iowa Republican delegation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will now ask Mr. TOWNE to continue the reading.

Mr. TOWNE continued, as follows:

Senator GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, in a speech made in the United States Senate on April 23 last, placed the value of exports sold at lower price abroad than at home at $4,000,000. I can not find that the substantial correctness of this estimate was ever questioned by the opposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, "the substantial accuracy" of that statement was "questioned," of course, and has been questioned with conclusive success. Why, I doubt not, there have been individual transactions that have amounted to nearly a million dollars, for that matter. I should judge that the amount thus bought by the Mexican National, the Canadian Pacific, and the Great Northern railroads of rails alone went nearly to $4,000,000. But rails are not all. From a plow or a sewing machine to a locomotive or steel for a bridge this abuse extends.

Everybody except the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] knows and acknowledges the existence of this great wrong. Even the man most trusted by Republican campaign managers, Representative BABCOCK, of Wisconsin, in an impulse of disgust and revolt, cried out in its presence.

The following from Representative BABCOCK, of Wisconsin, the chairman of the Republican national Congressional committee, appeared in the Washington Post September 21, 1901:

One of the points which impresesd me of the desirability of revising the steel schedule was information I obtained in Scotland of the placing of an order for 20,000 tons of American steel. When you stop to think that 20,000 tons of steel mean more than 1,000 carloads, it will not do to say that such an order placed abroad by our manufacturers is only their surplus product.

This, too, as far back as 1901. It is old history! What a long, long extended "dump!"

Now I want to quote from the Industrial Commission. The Industrial Commission summed up its conclusions as to export prices in volume 19, on pages 626 and 627 of that volume, as follows. I quote:

In about 20 per cent of the cases—

Says the Industrial Commission, a bipartisan commission, a majority of Republicans upon it—

In about 20 per cent of the cases covered by the Commission's returns the export prices have ruled lower than those charged to home consumers. The practice is quite common in all countries, etc.

Now let me go on. Here is what the Commission recommends:

That in view of the extent and protection of our manufactures, of our growing export trade and the sharp competition being encountered in foreign markets, of the practice by some exporters of making lower prices abroad than at home, and the desirability of protecting the consumer as well as the producer, without awaiting other legislation, the Congress provide for a commission to investigate and study the subject and to report as soon as possible what concessions in duties may be made without endangering wages or employment at home, what advantages abroad may be obtained therefor, and also to suggest measures best suited to gain the end desired.

The italics are mine.

Not "whether concessions" in duties shall be made, but "what concessions." That some must be made goes without saying, in their opinion. Ah, that recommendation from this nonpartisan body, with a majority of Republicans upon it, has been lying before you now for several years, and you have paid no heed to it, and you will not pay any heed to it, I predict, until the day of your reckoning comes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BATES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Allow me to finish this first. One of the members of that Commission, Thomas W. Phillips, did not sign the majority report, and in his supplemental statement he said what I will ask my friend [Mr. TOWNE] to read.

Mr. TOWNE (reading):

There are a large number of industries in which it is in evidence that the domestic price is much higher than the export price. I do not agree that the answers to inquiries addressed by the Commission to exporters indicate that the trusts are not chargeable with this practice to any serious extent. Out of 2,000 schedules of inquiries sent out, there were received only 416 replies, and only a very few of these replies came from corporations known popularly as trusts. (Vol. XIII, p. 726.) The fact that about 75 answers indicated lower prices abroad than at home is significant, when it is noted that more than four-fifths of those addressed failed to answer, and that naturally those who are chargeable with such discrimination would be the ones who would decline to reply.

Several witnesses before the Commission on behalf of the trusts admitted that their export prices were lower than their domestic prices, but they contended that this was necessary in order to work off their surplus and to keep their establishments running full time, and that the fact that their surplus products could also be worked off by lower prices at home, and that it is the tariff which encourages them to cause a domestic surplus by restricting domestic consumption through high prices.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The four-fifths who failed to answer failed or refused for the most part, it is fair to assume, because it was not to their interest to answer and acknowedge the fact and thus incite revolt against the present protectionist trust system and encourage the movement for tariff reduction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I give you certain testimony given before the Chamberlain tariff commission of Great Britain from British people who were testifying before that commission in 1904 to what American goods were sold at in Great Britain, and comparing those prices with certain prices prevailing in Pittsburg at the same time. "The report of this commission fairly bristles with such items as these," and were from firms in Great Britain:

Firm No. 312: "We have an offer this week of Siemens-Martin billets, made at Pittsburg, delivered c. i. f. British port, of 75 shillings per ton. This week's quotation for pig iron for steel-making purposes (see Iron Age, Jan. 21, 1904) is about $13 per ton at Pittsburg. The best-equipped works in Pittsburg sell at present raw material, wages and prices, manufactured pig iron into Siemens-Martin open-hearth billets at $6.50 per ton—that is, equal to $19.50 per ton at Pittsburg. The selling (pool) price at Pittsburg to-day for open-hearth billets is $24.

In other words, the Siemens-Martin billets, which were offered to firm No. 312 at 75 shillings per ton, were costing American consumers that same week $24, or 98.36 shillings per ton—23.36 shillings more to the American than to the foreigner.

Firm No. 898: "Pig iron from United States of America is imported into this country (England) below cost price here; our consumers are buying at 5 shillings per ton less than we can produce it, and the Americans are reported to be selling for export to England at a price equivalent to 8 shillings per ton lower than the price at which they are supplied in their own country."

COMPETITION IN THE COLONIES.

Witness No. 1 (505): "In Canada we suffer from American competition; I lost an order for 1,000 tons of steel rails there last week. America also competes in Australia and at the Cape, but not so keenly as in Canada. I can not give you the reason for the loss of the order for 1,000 tons of rails. The order was intended for Cape Breton, and was worked through Glasgow merchants, who assured us we would get the order. We lost it in spite of the 33 per cent preference."

So this "infant" American industry (the steel makers) are underselling Great Britain in Canada against a Canadian tariff handicap of 33⅓ in favor of Great Britain! What need has it of any "protective" duty? Why not pass my bill to cut duties on steel and iron from 50 to 60 per cent? How can they undersell Great Britain and why? Read this testimony before the Chamberlain commission and you will learn.

Witness No. 16 (1023, 1026, 1045, 1046): "The cost of converting pig iron into steel in the United States must, in the majority of cases, be somewhat less than the corresponding cost in this country, despite the fact that wages there are materially higher. But the cost is not in any two cases the same. The cost of labor was phenomenally low. In the case of a rod mill brought to my notice, it was less than 4s. per ton of rods. In the case of billets it has been under 4s. per ton. In the case of rails, it is probably, on an average, not more than 65 per cent what it is in this country. In the more finished forms of material it is more than in the lower forms, but whatever it may be, it is always controlled by the fact that the output of a given plant is usually two or three times that of kindred plants in Europe, with only half to two-thirds the number of hands here employed to run it. The industrial commission stated the average cost of the conversion of pig iron into steel billets at 6s. 6d., and the average incidental expenses at 3s., but this is much too high for the best plants.

"The combination of up-to-date plants, economies, and improvements has enabled our American rivals, paying the highest wages known in the trade, to produce plates at a cost of only about 3s. 6d. per ton for labor, averaging some 225 tons of plates per shift. One mill at Homestead works has produced 1,049 tons of sheared plates in twenty-four hours, which is at the rate of 315,000 tons in three hundred working days. A 40-inch cogging mill at the Illinois works at Chicago produces 200,000 to 250,000 tons per year. These results are not equaled in our own mills. And yet there is no reason to suppose that our plate-mill practice is generally much behind that of other countries. It was until lately, if it is not now, in advance of that of any other country. If it has now fallen somewhat behind the best American practice, probably not much ground has been lost.

"In the matter of nominal wages, Great Britain occupies an intermediate place between Germany and the United States, being, however, not so much higher than the Germans as we are below the American level.

"The higher American nominal wage rates do not, generally, appear to operate to the detriment of American mnufacturers. On the contrary, it is universally admitted that the real wage rate—the labor cost per unit of production—is less in the United States than in any other country. The best comparison of American and Britishers' wages that I know of, and one of the most recent, is that contained in the report of my colleague on the American Commission of the British Iron Trade Association in 1901, Mr. Axel Sahlin, who obtained from the managers of a considerable number of representative works actual wage rates, which showed that at blast furnaces, hour for hour, there was then but little difference in the rates paid as between Great Britain and America, while some of the American furnaces produced 3,500 to 4,000 tons per week, compared with 850 to 620 tons in England, with nearly the same number of hands. For unskilled labor, the British rate is materially lower than the American.

"I do not hesitate to say that if the Canadian had been charged the same prices as were nominally charged on the other side of the line, hardly any American iron and steel would have found its way into Canada during the last five years in competition with the cheaper prices quoted for British material."

"Nominal wages"—"real wages." "There's the rub!"

Mr. BATES. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman was reading a moment ago from the report of the Industrial Commission, was he not? I call his attention to the line in which he read that "the practice they found as generally indulged in, etc.," and he ceased reading. Does not the report of the Industrial Commission then go on to state that the practice was indulged in of selling abroad cheaper than at home by other countries than America, and notably England, which is a tariff for revenue country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It does not note England, as I remember, nor say "notably England," but it says it is "common in all countries"—a loose phrase. Now, in that connection I want to say to the gentleman that it is a common thing in all high protective-tariff countries. There is not a country anywhere with a high protective tariff where the system does not lead its people sooner or later to this result of having its home producers sell to foreigners cheaper than they sell to their own people. It is a necessary result of the system. It is both necessary and rendered possible by protectionism—rendered possible because successful combination is possible in most things only in a single country, from whose market the goods concerning which combination as to prices is sought to be made can have no competition from other lands, this competition being prohibited absolutely wherever the tariff is high enough.

Even England has a tobacco trust, because tobacco has there a high duty levied on it. Steel makers could not successfully combine and establish and for any time maintain exploitive prices in the home market there unless they could includue in the combination German, French, Spanish, Swedish, and American iron masters, all of whom, having free access to the British market, could (and would, unless in the combination) overwhelm it with competition. A combination of that magnitude, world wide, among antagonistic nationalities, struggling for markets, is unthinkable.

We are selling in Great Britain cheaper than at home, the Germans are selling in London cheaper than at home, the Frenchmen are selling some few things in London cheaper than in France, and in all cases it has grown out of this pernicious system of passing laws for the express purpose, or at least with the effect, of allowing men to exploit the home market.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman permit me just one question? Is it not true that in England, a free-trade country, the domestic price of steel rails is $31.50 a ton, and for exportation from Great Britain the price is $25 a ton?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should be very much astonished, indeed, if that were true.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman will find it to be absolutely true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe it is true, and the reason why I do not believe it is true I will give. I do not mean to say that I do not believe it is true that there never was an individual sale of that sort made, or here and there a short season of exceptional sales. But I lay this down as a fundamental conclusion from which no sound-minded man can escape; that where trade is free and untrammeled there can exist for no considerable length of time a system under which a man sends his goods away to sell them at a smaller profit in another country than the profit he can get in his own. The only inducement for that system is the possibility of controlling prices by combination at home, and that can be only when the competition of the world is shut out by law or nature. That there may have been individual instances in Great Britain or in any free-trade country of a man having unloaded a part of his goods either upon the home market or a foreign market at less than cost I can understand. But it is not consonant with any sort of human reason—unless the man had a sheltered market at home, where he by combination could fix his prices, which it was a matter of great profit to maintain—that he would of his own accord pay freight to sell goods somewhere else at a given price when he could sell them at the same price at home, and when he could be made to sell them at the same price at home by the in-rushing competition of the whole world. He would have no chance of recoupment in his home price because it itself—the home price—would be a world price. It is impossible for a combination to be formed which extends over free and untrammeled trade throughout the world. It is only in a sheltered market, in a restricted market, in a circumscribed market, that you find producers few enough and homogenous enough to enable them to enter into a successful combination and maintain it for any time worth the trouble.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Is not the gentleman aware that Europe is districted up on the steel-rail business?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Continental Europe, which is protectionist, perhaps. Does the gentleman desire to ask me a question pertinent to just what I have been discussing?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. In view of the courtesy extended yesterday to me, I do not think I will ask the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman means by that that I was lacking in courtesy to him yesterday, I am surprised to hear it and hurt to know it.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. I desired simply to ask a question now; that was all. I desire to ask if the gentleman was not aware that Europe was divided up, and its portion of steel rails was not assigned to Great Britain, its portion assigned to Germany, and its portion assigned to France, and precisely the thing which the gentleman now complains of is carried on in Great Britain as the result of combination in the free-trade country? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know it, and I defy the gentleman to furnish any authoritative and authentic and reliable proof of any such thing. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A free market—and Great Britain is for steel a free market—can not be apportioned out or "divided up." Continental markets in protectionist countries can be and doubtless are.

Mr. BATES. May I ask the gentleman one more question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BATES. May I read the answer of Mr. Gary, on page 279——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have already declined to have this steel-trust magnate's—Mr. Garys'—steel-trust stump speech inserted into the belly of my speech. I decline. He is an officer of a criminal corporation which fattens on constant violations of the unenforced law of his country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BATES. Does not the gentleman know——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I decline.

Mr. BATES. May I ask one question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BATES. Is not the testimony of Mr. Gary before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee that they sold their steel rails——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He can not do by indirection that which I refused him the right to do by direction. I decline to yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Now, the gentleman may ask me any question he chooses, but he must not, under the guise of asking me a question, do what I decline to let him do, to wit, put Mr. Gary's utterances in my speech.

Mr. BATES. Does the gentleman mean to say that he does not believe that Mr. Gary told the truth to this Commission?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would hate to answer that question. Mr. Gary is not here. I do not think I ought to answer. It would be unfair to him. I hate to do it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. But the gentleman had already said that Mr. Gary used a falsehood.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I also just stated that I had said it in the heat of debate, and that I ought not to have said it, and that I was going to strike it out of the RECORD.

Mr. BATES. I did not think the gentleman meant it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is a different thing. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can not put words in my mouth. If "the gentleman from Mississippi" did say it he ought not to have said it. I said that I ought not to say it. But you can not make me appear as not having meant it. That is a different proposition. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BATES. I merely said I did not think the gentleman meant it. I do not want to annoy the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And yet you seem to be seeking to do it by putting words in my mouth that I never uttered nor meant to utter. You are seeking persistently to insert what I do not desire to have inserted in my remarks.

Mr. BATES. I know the gentleman recoils from the figures of prices of steel of England sold abroad and at home because it is a so-called free-trade country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I have not recoiled from that proposition. Give me reliable figures from a reliable and unsuspected source. I recoil from Gary, the criminal trust magnate, as a witness in his own behalf; that is all.

Mr. BATES. I merely asked the price that Mr. Gary fixed for steel rails for home consumption.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have read that.

Mr. BATES. And those sold abroad?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the price of English rails. That was read. If the gentleman had listened to the reading of the article from the Post, that part of Mr. Gary's testimony which stated the prices he gave as the prices of rails in the markets here and there was read in that article.

I know my friends are actuated by the highest motives of courtesy to me, although to a small boy on the side it might look a little as if they were trying to make their speeches and, what I like less, Gary's steel speech in his own defense in my time. I do not know whether Gary swore to his speech or not!

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read from volume 3 of the Senate hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, page 1983, the testimony of Mr. Ramsey; and before it is read I want to tell you that Mr. Ramsey is the president of the Wabash and Ann Arbor Railroad, and, as he says, "some few other smaller roads." How many I do not know. But he is president of the Wabash and Ann Arbor road, or was when he testified, and that railroad runs through Canadian and through American territory both, and he has actually bought rails to be laid in both countries, and here is his testimony. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNE] to read it, and I especially wish those gentlemen who agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in his views to listen to this testimony. Senator CULLOM had asked him a question, and I will ask order while the House hears this part of his answer:

Mr. TOWNE read as follows:

Senator, if you will permit me, I will illustrate it by the rail question: Railroads in this country pay $28 at the mill for rails. The same maker will sell those rails to the Wabash for use in Canada at $20 to $21, provided they are used in Canada. We dare not use them in the United States. Now, we say to the makers of the rails, "We can buy English rails, delivered on these shores, at $20 a ton." Then Uncle Sam steps in and says, "Yes; you can do that, but if you buy those rails you will have to pay to Uncle Sam $8 a ton tariff on them." On lumber there is a $2 tariff rate, and that, Senator DOLLIVER, would add $75 to your house in Kansas or Iowa, four times as much as the railroad rate will. The tariff duties on steel and all these things force the railroads to pay to the makers of steel these high rates. Why does Uncle Sam do that? Why did they do it originally? To promote industry and commerce. And that is why they should permit the railroads to make low rates on traffic going abroad and low rates between various communities on the long haul, to do the very same thing. The Government pays a bonus in one case. In the other case they do not.

Senator CULLOM. I am not arguing the tariff question to-day.

Mr. RAMSEY. Neither am I. I am in favor of the tariff, and so are all railroad men, because while they pay $10 a ton more for their rails they probably get 10 tons more traffic by paying that and keeping up other industries. We do not object to paying a slight difference of that kind if we can get the traffic.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The important part of this testimony is the fact testified to, which I have italicized, and that it comes from one evidently friendly to protectionism and the Republican party.

Now, I note that some of the Republicans applauded right there at the statement of Mr. Ramsey that he did not mind paying these prices and the reason he gave why he did not mind it. Now, do you want me to tell you the two real reasons why he did not mind it? The first is that the railroads do not, in the long run, pay for the rails. They get the price of them back in freight and dividends. The people—the shippers—do the ultimate paying. I will tell you the second real reason why few of the existing railroads mind it. It is because they have already bought their rails, and have already put them down, and new railroads to be built, which would be competitors of theirs, would buy their rails at one-third less if fair prices prevailed, as would be the case with a revenue duty, and that would hurt existing roads in their business—their dividends—very much. It would enable new roads to earn a larger percentage as a dividend, while undercarrying them on both freight and passengers. Therefore they are not anxious that the tariff should be reduced. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed with the speech of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. The gentleman from Iowa concluded his speech by saying that the Grand Old Party "was a party of progress," but that "it never progressed beyond the limitation of its principles." Why, Mr. Chairman, protectionism is not a question of principles; protectionism is a question of interests. Protectionism is a question of schedules, and schedules generally allied with one another and hanging together, lest "if they do not hang together, each will hang separately." Why, you can not make things go forward or progress by a system like protectionism. They may go forward under and in spite of your system, but they can not go forward because of it. It is a system of Sisyphism, and as Bastiat could always express himself more clearly than any other human being when he talked about these things, I shall ask you to follow what he has written in his Sophisms of Protection, beginning on page 18. He explains the system of Sisyphism, which is a system amounting to about as much profitably as rolling stones from one place to another and back. You Republicans are all disciples of Sisyphus.

Here is what Bastiat says:

OBSTACLE—CAUSE—SISYPHISM.

The obstacle mistaken for cause—scarcity mistaken for abundance. The sophism is the same. It is well to study it under every aspect.

Man naturally is in a state of entire destitution.

Between this state and the satisfying of his wants there exists a multitude of obstacles which it is the object of labor to surmount. It is interesting to seek how and why he could have been led to look even upon these obstacles to his happiness as the cause of it.

* * * * * * *

Through the journey of life, in the long series of days from the cradle to the tomb, man has many difficulties to oppose his progress. Hunger, thirst, sickness, heat, cold are so many obstacles scattered along his road. In a state of isolation he would be obliged to combat them all by hunting, fishing, agriculture, spinning, weaving, architecture, etc., and it is very evident that it would be better for him if these difficulties should exist to a less degree, or even not at all. In a state of society he is not obliged personally to struggle with each of these obstacles, but others do it for him, and he in return must remove some of them for the benefit of his fellow-men.

Again, it is evident that, considering mankind as a whole, it would be better for society if these obstacles should be as weak and as few as possible.

But if we examine closely and in detail the phenomena of society and the private interests of men as modified by exchange of produce, we perceive without difficulty how it has happened that wants have been confounded with riches and the obstacles with the cause.

The separation of occupations, which results from the habits of exchange, causes each man, instead of struggling against all surrounding obstacles, to combat only one, the effort being made not for himself alone, but for the benefit of his fellows, who in their turn render a similar service to him.

Now, it hence results that this man looks upon the obstacle which he has made it his profession to combat for the benefit of others as the immediate cause of his riches. The greater, the more serious, the more stringent may be this obstacle the more he is remunerated for the conquering of it by those who are relieved by his labors.

A physician, for instance, does not busy himself in baking his bread or in manufacturing his clothing and his instruments; others do it for him, and he in return combats the maladies with which his patients are afflicted. The more dangerous and frequent these maladies are the more others are willing, the more even are they forced, to work in his service. Disease, then, which is an obstacle to the happiness of mankind, becomes to him the source of his comforts. The reasoning of all producers is, in what concerns themselves, the same. As the doctor draws his profits from disease, so does the shipowner from the obstacle called distance; the agriculturist from that named hunger; the cloth manufacturer from cold; the schoolmaster lives upon ignorance, the jeweler upon vanity, the lawyer upon quarrels, the notary upon breach of faith. Each profession has, then, an immediate interest in the continuation, even in the extension, of the particular obstacle to which its attention has been directed.

Theorists hence go on to found a system upon these individual interests and say: Wants are riches; labor is riches; the obstacle to well-being is well-being; to multiply obstacles is to give food to industry.

Then comes the statesman; and as the developing and propagating of obstacles is the developing and propagating of riches, what more natural than that he should bend his efforts to that point? He says, for instance, if we prevent a large importation of iron, we create a difficulty in procuring it. This obstacle severely felt, obliges individuals to pay in order to relieve themselves from it. A certain number of our citizens, giving themselves up to the combating of this obstacle, will thereby make their fortunes. In proportion, too, as the obstacle is great and the mineral scarce, inaccessible, and of difficult and distant transportation, in the same proportion will be the number of laborers maintained by the various branches of this industry.

The same reasoning will lead to the suppression of machinery.

Here are men who are at a loss how to dispose of their wine harvest. This is an obstacle which other men set about removing for them by the manufacture of casks. It is fortunate, say our statesmen, that this obstacle exists, since it occupies a portion of the labor of the nation and enriches a certain number of our citizens. But here is presented to us an ingenious machine, which cuts down the oak, squares it, makes it into staves, and, gathering these together, forms them into casks. The obstacle is thus diminished, and with it the profits of the coopers. We must prevent this. Let us proscribe the machine!

To sift thoroughly this sophism it is sufficient to remember that human labor is not an end, but a means. It is never without employment. If one obstacle is removed it is free to seize another, and mankind is delivered from two obstacles by the same effort which was at first necessary for one. If the labor of coopers becomes useless, it must take another direction. But with what, it may be asked, will they be remunerated? Precisely with what they are at present remunerated. For if a certain quantity of labor becomes free from its original occupation, to be otherwise disposed of, a corresponding quantity of capital to pay wages must thus also become free. To maintain that human labor can end by wanting employment it would be necessary to prove that mankind will cease to encounter obstacles. In such a case labor would be not only impossible; it would be superfluous. We should have nothing to do, because we should be all powerful, and our fiat alone would satisfy at once our wants and our desires.

EFFORT—RESULT—SISYPHISM.

We have seen that between our wants and their gratification many obstacles are interposed. We conquer or weaken these by the employment of our faculties. It may be said, in general terms, that industry is an effort followed by a result.

But by what do we measure our well-being? By the result of our effort, or by the effort itself? There exists always a proportion between the effort employed and the result obtained. Does progress consist in the relative increase of the second, or of the first term of this proportion?

Both propositions have been sustained, and in political economy opinions are divided between them.

According to the first system riches are the result of labor. They increase in the same ratio as the result does to the effort. Absolute perfection, of which God is the type, consists in the infinite distance between these two terms in this relation, viz, effort none, result infinite.

This second system maintains that it is the effort itself which forms the measure of and constitutes our riches. Progression is the increase of the proportion of the effort to the result. Its ideal extreme may be represented by the eternal efforts of Sisyphus.

The first system tends naturally to the encouragement of everything which diminishes difficulties and augments production; for example, powerful machinery, which adds to the strength of man; the cheap exchange of produce, which allows us to profit by the various natural agents distributed in different degrees over the surface of our globe; the intellect which discovers, experience which proves, and emulation which excites.

The second as logically inclines to everything which can suggest the difficulty and diminish the product, as privileges, monopolies, restrictions, prohibitions, suppression of machinery, sterility, etc.

It is well to remark here that the universal practice of men is always guided by the principle of the first system. Every workman, whether agriculturist, manufacturer, merchant, soldier, writer, or philosopher, devotes the strength of his intellect to do better, to do more quickly, more economically—in a word, to do more with less.

The opposite doctrine is in use with legislators, editors, "statesmen," men whose business is to make experiments upon society. And even of these we may observe that in what personally concerns themselves they act, like everybody else, upon the principle of obtaining from their labor the greatest possible quantity of useful results.

It may be supposed that I exaggerate, and that there are no true Sisyphists.

I grant that in practice the principle is not pushed to its extremest consequences. And this must always be the case when one starts upon a wrong principle, because the absurd and injurious results to which it leads can not but check it in its progress. For this reason practical industry never can admit of Sisyphism. The error is too quickly followed by its punishment to remain concealed. But in the speculative industry of theorists and statesmen a false principle may be for a long time followed up before the complication of its consequences, only half understood, can prove its falsity; and even when all is revealed the opposite principle is acted upon, self is contradicted, and justification sought in the incomparably absurd modern axiom that in political economy there is no principle universally true.

Let us see, then, if the two opposite principles I have laid down do not predominate, each in its turn—the one in practical industry, the other in industrial legislation.

I have already quoted some words of Mr. Bugeaud [Bugeaud was a French legislator and landlord, contemporary of Bastiat.—J. S. W.], but we must look on Mr. Bugeaud in two separate characters, the agriculturist and the legislator.

As agriculturist Mr. Bugeaud makes every effort to attain the double object of sparing labor and obtaining cheap bread. When he prefers a good plow to a bad one; when he improves the quality of his manures; when, to loosen his soil, he substitutes as much as possible the action of the atmosphere for that of the hoe or harrow; when he calls to his aid every improvement that science and experience have revealed, he has, and can have, but one object, viz, to diminish the proportion of the effort to the result. We have, indeed, no other means of judging of the success of an agriculturist or of the merits of his system but by observing how far he has succeeded in lessening the one while he increases the other, and as all the farmers in the world act upon this principle we may say that all mankind are seeking, no doubt for their own advantage, to obtain at the lowest price bread or whatever other article of food they may need, always diminishing the effort necessary for obtaining any given quantity thereof.

This incontestable tendency of human nature, once proved, would, one might suppose, be sufficient to point out the true principle to the legislator and to show him how he ought to assist industry—if, indeed, it is any part of his business to assist it at all—for it would be absurd to say that the laws of men should operate in an inverse ratio from those of Providence.

Yet we have heard Mr. Bugeaud, in his charactor of legislator, exclaim, "I do not understand this theory of cheapness; I would rather see bread dear and work more abundant." And consequently the deputy from Dordogne votes in favor of legislative measures whose effect is to shackle and impede commerce, precisely because by so doing we are prevented from procuring by exchange and at low price what direct production can only furnish more expensively.

Now, it is very evident that the system of Mr. Bugeaud the deputy is directly opposed to that of Mr. Bugeaud the agriculturist. Were he consistent with himself, he would as legislator vote against all restriction, or else as farmer he would practice in his fields the same principle which he proclaims in the public councils. We should then see him sowing his grain in his most sterile fields, because he would thus succeed in laboring much to obtain little. We should see him forbidding the use of the plow, because he could, by scratching up the soil with his nails, fully gratify his double wish of "dear bread and abundant labor."

Restriction has for its avowed object and acknowledged effect the augmentation of labor. And, again, equally avowed and acknowledged, its object and effect are the increase of prices—a synonymous term for scarcity of produce. Pushed, then, to its greatest extreme, it is pure Sisyphism, as we have defined it—labor infinite, result nothing.

Baron Charles Dupin, who is looked upon as the oracle of the peerage in the science of political economy, accuses railroads of injuring shipping, and it is certainly true that the most perfect means of attaining an object must always limit the use of a less perfect means. But railways can only injure shipping by drawing from it articles of transportation. This they can only do by transporting more cheaply, by diminishing the proportion of the effort employed to the result obtained, for it is in this that cheapness consists. When, therefore, Baron Dupin laments the supression of labor in attaining a given result, he maintains the doctrine of Sisyphism. Logically, if he prefers the vessel to the railway, he should also prefer the wagon to the vessel, the pack saddle to the wagon, and the wallet to the pack saddle, for this is, of all known means of transportation, the one which requires the greatest amount of labor in proportion to the result obtained.

"Labor constitutes the riches of the people," said Mr. De St. Cricq, a minister who has laid not a few shackles upon our commerce. This was no elliptical expression, meaning that the "results of labor constitute the riches of the people." No; this statesman intended to say that it is the intensity of labor which measures riches; and the proof of this is that from step to step, from restriction to restriction, he forced on France (and in so doing believed that he was doing well) to give to the procuring of, for instance, a certain quantity of iron double the necessary labor. In England iron was then at 8 francs; in France it cost 16. Supposing the day's work to be worth 1 franc, it is evident that France could, by barter, procure a quintal of iron by eight days' labor taken from the labor of the nation. Thanks to the restrictive measures of Mr. De St. Cricq, sixteen days' work were necessary to procure it by direct production. Here, then, we have double labor for an identical result; therefore double riches; and riches measured not by the result, but by the intensity of labor. Is not this pure and unadulterated Sisyphism?

That there may be nothing equivocal, the minister carries his idea still further, and on the same principle that we have heard him call the intensity of labor riches we will find him calling the abundant results of labor and the plenty of everything proper to the satisfying of our wants poverty. "Everywhere," he remarks, "machinery has pushed aside manual labor; everywhere production is superabundant; everywhere the equilibrium is destroyed between the power of production and that of consumption." Here, then, we see that, according to Mr. De St. Cricq, if France was not in a critical situation, it was because her productions were too abundant; there is too much intelligence, too much efficiency in her national labor. We are too well fed, too well clothed, too well supplied with everything. The rapid production was more than sufficient for our wants. It was necessary to put an end to this calamity, and therefore it became needful to force us, by restrictions, to work more in order to produce less.

I also touched upon an opinion expressed by another minister of commerce, Mr. d'Argout, which is worthy of being a little more closely looked into. Wishing to give a deathblow to the beet, he said: "The culture of the beet is undoubtedly useful, but this usefulness is limited. It is not capable of the prodigious developments which have been predicted of it. To be convinced of this it is enough to remark that the cultivation of it must necessarily be confined within the limits of consumption. Double, treble if you will, the present consumption of France, and you will still find that a very small portion of her soil will suffice for this consumption. (Truly a most singular cause for complaint.) Do you wish the proof of this? How many hectares were planted in beets in the year 1828? Three thousand one hundred and thirty, which is one-ten thousand five hundred and fortieth of our cultivable soil. How many are there at this time, when our domestic sugar supplies one-third of the consumption of the country? Sixteen thousand seven hundred hectares, or one-one thousand nine hundred and seventy-eighth of the cultivable soil, or 45 centares for each commune. Suppose that our domestic sugar should monopolize the supply of the whole consumption, we still would have but 48,000 hectares, or one-six hundred and eighty-ninth of our cultivable soil in beets."

There are two things to consider in this quotation. The facts and the doctrine. The facts go to prove that very little soil, capital, and labor would be necessary for the production of a large quantity of sugar, and that each commune of France would be abundantly provided with it by giving up 1 hectare to its cultivation. The peculiarity of the doctrine consists in the looking upon this facility of production as an unfortunate circumstance, and the regarding the very fruitfulness of this new branch of industry as a limitation to its usefulness.

I began by saying that a variable proportion exists in all industrial pursuits between the effort and the result. Absolute imperfection consists in an infinite effort without any result; absolute perfection, in an unlimited result without any effort, and perfectibility, in the progressive diminution of the effort compared with the result.

But Mr. d'Argout tells us that where we looked for life we shall find only death. The importance of any object of industry is, according to him, in direct proportion to its feebleness. What, for instance, can we expect from the beet? Do you not see that 48,000 hectares of land, with capital and labor in proportion, will suffice to furnish sugar to all France? It is then an object of limited usefulness—limited, be it understood, in the work that it calls for—and this is the sole measure, according to our minister, of the usefulness of any pursuit. This usefulness would be much more limited still if, thanks to the fertility of the soil or the richness of the beet, 24,000 hectares would serve instead of 48,000. If there were only needed twenty times, a hundred times, more soil, more capital, more labor, to attain the same result! Oh, then some hopes might be founded upon this article of industry! It would be worthy of the protection of the state, for it would open a vast field to national labor! But to produce much with little is a bad example, and the laws ought to set things to rights!

What is true with regard to sugar can not be false with regard to bread. If, therefore, the usefulness of an object of industry is to be calculated, not by the comforts which it can furnish with a certain quantum of labor, but, on the contrary, by the increase of labor which it requires in order to furnish a certain quantity of comforts, it is evident that we ought to desire that each acre of land should produce little corn and that each grain of corn should furnish little nutriment; in other words, that our territory should be sterile enough to require a considerably larger proportion of soil, capital, and labor to nourish its population. The demand for human labor could not fail to be in direct proportion to this sterility, and then truly would the wishes of Messrs. Bugeaud, St. Cricq, Dupin, and d'Argout be satisfied; bread would be dear, work abundant, and France would be rich—rich according to the understanding of these gentlemen.

All that we could have further to hope for would be that human intellect might sink and become extinct, for while intellect exists it can but seek continually to increase the proportion of the end to the means; of the product to the labor. Indeed, it is in this continuous effort, and in this alone, that intellect consists.

Sisyphism has then been the doctrine of all those who have been intrusted with the regulation of the industry of our country. It would not be just to reproach them with this; for this principle becomes that of our ministry only because it prevails in the chambers; it prevails in the chambers only because it is sent there by the electoral body, and the electoral body is imbued with it only because public opinion is filled with it to repletion.

Let me repeat here that I do not accuse such men as Messrs. Bugeaud, Dupin, St. Cricq, and d'Argout of being absolutely and always sisyphists. Very certainly they are not such in their personal transactions; very certainly each of them will procure for himself by barter what by direct production would be attainable only at a higher price. But I maintain that they are Sisyphists when they prevent the country from acting upon the same principle.

Bastiat wrote this in 1856, the year the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] was born. It has been written a long time, it is old, but, like the Sermon on the Mount and the Ten Commandments, which were reduced to writing even earlier, it is clear, because true, and, like all truth, as true now as when I was 2 years old and when the gentleman from Illinois was born.

How wonderfully strange and yet natural it is that all you have to do to bring it down to date and transplant it to America is to change the names Bugeaud, Dupin, St. Cricq, and l'Argout to Shaw and the names of the three leaders of this House. They are Sisyphists all.

Mr. BOUTELL. Right in that connection, may I ask just one little question, very short and very pertinent to this?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELL. Bastiat is the recognized apostle of free trade?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], the distinguished and scholarly economist who is the gentleman's associate on the Committee on Rules, says that free trade is "an idle and an academic dream." I should like to know whether that applies also to this book.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, now, that is not pertinent to what I said. Free trade is "an idle and an academic dream" in the United States with our Constitution. It is not in any other country. It does seem curious that a man of such magnificent sense should take the trouble to rise at all to ask that question. Suppose Bastiat had been an apostle of the Campbellite Church, of which my friend, CHAMP CLARK, is also a member? What in the name of common sense has that to do with what I am talking about or with the truth or soundness of what I read? Bastiat's words speak for themselves the damnation of your system. What matter whether he who speaks them be free trader or tariff-for-revenue man, if only his reasonings against protectionism be sound and clear and true, as they are? The point of touch between him and me is that we are both antiprotectionists, though he was a free trader and I am a tariff-for-revenue man.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, if the question is not pertinent I withdraw it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want rapidly to say a few words myself. I mean by that to make a speech of my own, and not merely to be chained down by the limitations of the utterances of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. Chairman, my objections to the system of protectionism are, mainly, threefold. I object to it because it is an immoral system and suggestive of corrupting influence in public life. I object to it because it is a socialistic system and suggestive of other forms of state socialism and communism. I object to it as a fiscal system because it is an inelastic system.

Now, as a question of morals, I say that there is no moral right vested in government to take the proceeds from my cotton or wheat or labor, or the proceeds of the sweat and toil of the bricklayer, or of a sewing woman, or the proceeds of the wheat of my friend [Mr. WADSWORTH] away from me or them or him, for any other purpose except for some public use. Certainly not to enrich or to better the condition of another citizen. It is rank favoritism, under the form of law, to take from me to serve the private financial advancement of another. Even if you could prove, gentlemen of the Republican party, that protectionism could create an industry for somebody else's enrichment—and I admit that it can; I admit that it has done it, and I admit that it may do it again—or that it could make a lagging industry prosperous, the truth of what I have already asserted would still stick.

It is in this sense, Mr. Chairman, that we say that protectionism is robbery. We do not say that a tariff is robbery, as the gentleman from Iowa seems to think we say, but that a tariff levied for such a purpose is robbery. We do not mean by that that the men who get the advantage of it are robbers, but that the system itself is robbery. I may live under a system under which I must live; I do not make the law, the legal environment is made for me. It is not wrong for me to work in that environment, it is indeed needful that I should; it is not wrong for me to make the profits that the environment permits me lawfully to make. But I say the system, in so far as it lessens pro tanto the result of the exercise of the intellect or of the muscle of one man to the enrichment of another, or for the creation of an industry, or for the purpose of spurring into activity a lagging industry, is to that extent taking his property without due and proper process of law and without any just compensation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a tariff for revenue is for the public use. It is no more robbery, even if there shall be some little incidental and unavoidable but not purposed protection in connection with it, than any other form of taxation. Why? Because, although the Government takes the money from the people, the money goes into the Treasury, and from the Treasury it goes back to the people. When it goes into the Treasury and is paid out, it is its own compensation, and in many cases it is a compensation of many fold greater value than the cost of the tax; as, for example, when it hurls back a foreign enemy; as, for example, when it deepens rivers and harbors and frees commerce from the tyranny of extortionate freight rates, thereby accomplishing the very opposite of the aim and effect of protectionism; it is compensation a thousandfold when it educates children to be competent citizens of a great Republic, or when it secures an equal administration of equal laws.

But where a tariff is levied for the purpose of enriching somebody, making somebody prosperous, or keeping somebody prosperous or for any private use; where the proceeds go not to the Treasury, and hence back to the people, but to the upbuilding of the private business of individuals or corporations, it is taking from me to give to another, or from another to give to me, and is a confiscation pro tanto of the property of the former for the benefit of the latter. The Government has no right to put its hands into the pockets of a citizen save only to get money to defend the national life or the national territory, to preserve the public health or morals, or to protect the individual in his life, limb, property, the pursuit of his happiness, or from injustice. It is not only immoral in itself, but it suggests other forms of like immorality; other ways of appropriating the property of others under the forms of law to one's own private use and advancement, or to the use or advancement of one's friends or adherents; other ways of making the law—making the power of the nation, State, or city—subservient to private interests and private enterprise. If I may, as a Congressman, use the taxing power for my own enrichment or for the enrichment of some of my constituents, regardless of whether they are capitalists or laborers (though somehow it makes no laborers rich, with all its pretense of doing it), if this be an allowable legislative end, and not at most the mere incident unsought—a necessary evil—of the accomplishment of a right end, why may not I indulge in other forms of national legislative favoritism for myself or for my friends? If I am not a national legislator, but a member of a town council, why may not I, on the same ground, warp the city ordinances so as to put money into the pockets of my friends or myself? Why may not I so act that through the granting of an ordinance for some great trolley car line, or the laying out of some boulevard, or through the passage of some contract law so worded that only one contractor can get it, or however else it might be, so act as to "put money in my purse," or in that of client, friend, or adherent? Why not, as a director or officer of a great insurance company, so direct the investment of the funds intrusted to my care as a trustee as to build up a syndicate in which my friends, perhaps I, have an interest? Where is the precise line of demarcation between these several forms of graft? You are more accustomed to one than to the others; that is all. Protectionism may or may not be the mother of trusts. It certainly makes the formation and maintenance of trusts more easy. It is in this far the mother of graft: It accustoms men's minds to the idea of legislating for private benefit rather than public need.

Mr. Chairman, some Republican answers that a protective tariff "creates national wealth;" that it is, therefore, a national benefit. That protectionism can create an industry, I grant you—an industry that never would have existed without the tariff, or one that would not have existed for many years but for a tariff.

It can also hasten certain processes of industrial development at the expense of the balance of your citizenry. It can create an industry, I repeat, but it can not create wealth. These are by no means the same thing. All it can do is to induce the transfer of capital from some one industry to some other industry. From what sort of industry to what sort of industry? Generally from a naturally profitable industry to a naturally unprofitable industry, which, without artificial legislative boosting, would, for the present at any rate, remain unprofitable. There would be no necessity for legislative inducement to go into an industry already profitable. What boots it a people to legislate so as to transfer the capital of the country from naturally profitable channels of industry to channels of industry never to be, or not yet become, naturally profitable?

Ah, but you say it "gives employment to labor." It does no such thing. Here again, it can only transfer labor from one form of employment to another form of employment. It can not increase the sum total of the work which labor can do. It can not decrease the birth rate. It can not make fewer laborers. It can not increase the fund from which wages must be paid. It can of course take a man out of the field and induce him to go into the factory, and early in the history of this country that was what it did. It would not have to be done now even if there were no tariff, for that matter. We have reached that density of population, that paucity of return from agriculture—in a word, that industrial stage—where factories would have come of themselves. But you say this transfer of the man from the cotton or the wheat field to the cotton factory is a benefit to the cotton and wheat planter, because there are that many more people to wear cotton and to eat wheat? Not so. The tariff does not increase the birth rate, i. e., the number of men, and the individual man does not buy any more clothes or eat any more bread because he is working in the protected factory than he would have bought if he were working on the farm or in some other factory. The only difference is, he would have had to buy such clothes made out of my cotton as he had to have anyway, and such bread as he had to have anyhow, and if he had stayed where he was at first I would not have had to pay him for buying them. That is all.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman believes that protection is wrong. Now, if protection is wrong, would it not be fairer from the gentleman's standpoint to impose a pure tariff for revenue only—that is, a tariff upon things the like of which we do not grow or produce in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That would not be a tariff "for revenue only." That would be a tariff "for free trade." I answered that yesterday. Therefore I shall not answer it to-day.

I spent twenty minutes yesterday in which I made the distinction between a tariff for free trade and a tariff for revenue only, and the gentleman in his question has precisely defined a tariff for free trade. I told why I stood for tariff for revenue. I would be glad to do it now, but it is already in my remarks.

It is said that protectionism "gives employment to labor." Now, my friends, it can only induce a transfer of labor from one field of employment to another and this only to the loss or at the cost of all. A great deal of this fallacy grows out of the confusion in the minds of people about what wealth is. People say that labor is wealth. Labor is not wealth. Labor never was wealth and labor never will be wealth. Wealth is the abundance which is created at a profit by labor, but not labor itself. Labor operating on material is the source of wealth or abundance, but it is not wealth. It is the result of labor that is wealth and the more result you can get with the less labor expended the wealthier you are as a man or a nation, and therefore if under your natural condition you can without legislative boosting employ labor so as to make that which is suited to your climate and your soil and your industrial development, and with the price of that product can buy something that somebody else can make cheaper than you can make it for yourself, you grow wealthy by the process. Labor employed constantly one hundred years at a naturally unprofitable occupation, whether made profitable to those engaged in it by legislation or not, can create nothing but a loss of wealth. It does not make any difference who suffers the loss of wealth, whether the employer or the laborer, or whether by some legislative legerdemain the employer can shift the loss off upon the consumers—the mass of the people—somebody is paying that loss, somebody is paying the cost. The only thing that is being created is a loss. This occurs by misdirection of both labor and capital. And yet the individual enterprise may be in the highest degree profitable to those who conduct it and collect the tax from the consumer on each sale.

Now, I am going to have my friend TOWNE read from page 289 of Bastiat, a chapter containing a conversation between Friday and Robinson Crusoe upon this very subject. I ask gentlemen to listen to this because it is delightful. Remember that Robinson Crusoe represents the Republican party and its protectionist argument, and then, when this is read, gentlemen will see how Robinson Crusoe was perfectly justifiable from the Republican standpoint in refusing to take the plank that was floating in from the ship free, because it would deprive him of the employment in labor which would be necessary for him to make the plank for himself, although at the end of his labor he had after all only a plank; which he might have had for nothing, if he had not been a Sisyphist.

Mr. TOWNE read as follows:

THE SOMETHING ELSE FOR LABOR AND CAPITAL TO DO WHEN NOT MISDIRECTED BY LEGISLATION INTO NATURALLY UNPROFITABLE ENTERPRISE, INCLUDING A CONVERSATION BETWEEN ROBINSON CRUSOE AND HIS GOOD MAN FRIDAY.

What is restriction?

A partial prohibition.

What is prohibition?

An absolute restriction.

So that what is said of one is true of the other?

Yes; comparatively. They bear the same relation to each other that the arc of the circle does to the circle.

Then if prohibition is bad, restriction can not be good?

No more than the arc can be straight if the circle is curved.

What is the common name for restriction and prohibition?

Protection.

What is the definite effect of protection?

To require from men harder labor for the same result.

Why are men so attached to the protective system?

Because, since liberty would accomplish the same result with less labor, this apparent diminution of labor frightens them.

Why do you say apparent?

Because all labor economized can be devoted to something else.

What else?

That can not and need not be determined.

Why?

Because, if the total of the comforts of France [or America—J. S. W.] could be gained with a diminution of one-tenth on the total of its labor, no one could determine what comforts it would procure with the labor remaining at its disposal. One person would prefer to be better clothed, another better fed, another better taught, and another more amused.

Explain the workings and effect of protection.

It is not an easy matter. Before taking hold of a complicated instance it must be studied in the simplest one.

Take the simplest you choose.

Do you recollect how Robinson Crusoe, having no saw, set to work to make a plank?

Yes. He cut down a tree, and then with his ax hewed the trunk on both sides until he got it down to the thickness of a board.

And that gave him an abundance of work?

Fifteen full days.

What did he live on during this time?

His provisions.

What happened to the ax?

It was all blunted.

Very good; but there is one thing which, perhaps, you do not know. At the moment that Robinson gave the first blow with his ax, he saw a plank which the waves had cast up on the shore.

Oh, the lucky accident! He ran to pick it up?

It was his first impulse, but he checked himself, reasoning thus:

"If I go after this plank, it will cost me but the labor of carrying it and the time spent in going to and returning from the shore.

"But if I make a plank with my ax, I shall, in the first place, obtain work for fifteen days, then I shall wear out my ax, which will give me an opportunity of repairing it, and I shall consume my provisions, which will be a third source of labor, since they must be replaced. Now, labor is wealth. It is plain that I will ruin myself if I pick up this stranded board. It is important to protect my personal labor, and, now that I think of it, I can create myself additional labor by kicking this board back into the sea."

But this reasoning was absurd!

Certainly. Nevertheless, it is that adopted by every nation which protects itself by prohibition. It rejects the plank which is offered it in exchange for a little labor, in order to give itself more labor. It sees a gain even in the labor of the custom-house officer. This answers to the trouble which Robinson took to give back to the waves the present they wished to make him. Consider the nation a collective being, and you will not find an atom of difference between its reasoning and that of Robinson.

Did not Robinson see that he could use the time saved in doing something else?

What "something else?"

So long as one has wants and time, one has always something to do. I am not bound to specify the labor that he could undertake. I can specify very easily that which he would have avoided. I assert, that Robinson, with incredible blindness, confounded labor with its result—the end with the means—and I will prove it to you.

It is not necessary, but this is the restrictive or prohibitory system in its simplest form. If it appears absurd to you, thus stated, it is because the two qualities of producer and consumer are here united in the same person.

Let us, then, pass to a more complicated instance.

Willingly. Some time after all this, Robinson having met Friday, they united and began to work in common. They hunted for six hours each morning and brought home four hampers of game. They worked in the garden for six hours each afternoon and obtained four baskets of vegetables.

One day a canoe touched at the Island of Despair. A good-looking stranger landed, and was allowed to dine with our two hermits. He tasted, and praised the products of the garden, and before taking leave of his hosts, said to them:

"Generous Islanders, I dwell in a country much richer in game than this, but where horticulture is unknown. It would be easy for me to bring you every evening four hampers of game if you would give me only two baskets of vegetables." [Leaving R. & F. to work only nine hours instead of twelve hours, and yet to get the same result.]

At these words Robinson and Friday stepped on one side, to have a consultation, and the debate which followed is too interesting not to be given in extenso:

FRIDAY. Friend, what do you think of it?

ROBINSON. If we accept we are ruined.

FRIDAY. Is that certain? Calculate!

ROBINSON. It is all calculated. Hunting, crushed out by competition, will be a lost branch of industry for us.

FRIDAY. What difference does that make, if we have the game?

ROBINSON. Theory! It will not be the product of our labor.

FRIDAY. Yes; it will, since we will have to give vegetables to get it.

ROBINSON. Then what shall we make?

FRIDAY. The four hampers of game cost us six hours' labor. The stranger gives them to us for two baskets of vegetables, which take us but three hours. Thus three hours remain at our disposal.

ROBINSON. Say rather that they are taken from our activity. There is our loss. Labor is wealth, and if we lose a fourth of our time, we are one-fourth poorer.

FRIDAY. Friend, you make an enormous mistake. The same amount of game and vegetables and three free hours to boot make progress, or there is none in the world.

ROBINSON. Mere generalities. What will we do with these three hours?

FRIDAY. We will do something else.

ROBINSON. Ah, now I have you. You can specify nothing. It is very easy to say something else—something else.

FRIDAY. We will fish. We will adorn our houses. We will read the Bible.

ROBINSON. Utopia! Is it certain that we will do this rather than that?

FRIDAY. Well, if we have no wants, we will rest. Is rest nothing?

ROBINSON. When one rests, one dies of hunger.

FRIDAY. Friend, you are in a vicious circle. I speak of a rest which diminishes neither our gains nor our vegetables. You always forget that by means of our commerce with this stranger nine hours of labor will give us as much food as twelve now do.

ROBINSON. It is easy to see that you were not reared in Europe. Perhaps you have never read the Moniteur Industriel [or the American Economist.—J. S. W.]. It would have taught you this: "All time saved is a dear loss. Eating is not the important matter, but working. Nothing which we consume counts if it is not the product of our labor. Do you wish to know whether you are rich? Do not look at your comforts, but at your trouble." This is what the Moniteur Industriel would have taught you. I, who am not a theorist, see but the loss of our hunting.

FRIDAY. What a strange perversion of ideas. But——

ROBINSON. No buts. Besides, there are political reasons for rejecting the interested offers of this perfidious stranger.

FRIDAY. Political reasons?

ROBINSON. Yes. In the first place, he makes these offers only because they are for his advantage.

FRIDAY. So much the better, since they are for ours also.

ROBINSON. Then by these exchanges we shall become dependent on him.

FRIDAY. And he on us. We need his game, he our vegetables, and we will live in good friendship.

ROBINSON. Fancy! Do you want I should leave you without an answer?

FRIDAY. Let us see. I am still waiting a good reason.

ROBINSON. Supposing that the stranger learns to cultivate a garden and that his island is more fertile than ours. Do you see the consequences?

FRIDAY. Yes. Our relations with the stranger will stop. He will take no more vegetables from us since he can get them at home with less trouble. He will bring us no more game since we will have nothing to give in exchange, and we will be then just where you want us to be now.

ROBINSON. Short-sighted savage! You do not see that after having destroyed our hunting by inundating us with game he will kill our gardening by overwhelming us with vegetables.

FRIDAY. But he will do that only so long as we give him something else—that is to say, so long as we find something else to produce which will economize our labor.

ROBINSON. Something else; something else! You always come back to that. You are very vague, friend Friday; there is nothing practical in your views.

The contest lasted a long time, and, as often happens, left each one convinced that he was right. However, Robinson, having great influence over Friday, his views prevailed, and when the stranger came for an answer Robinson said to him:

"Stranger, in order that your proposition may be accepted, we must be sure of two things: The first is that your island is not richer in game than ours, for we will struggle, but with equal arms. The second is that you will lose by the bargain. For, as in every exchange there is necessarily a gainer and a loser, we would be cheated if you were not. What have you to say?"

"Nothing, nothing," replied the stranger, who burst out laughing and returned to his canoe.

The story would not be bad if Robinson was not so foolish.

He is no more so than the committee in Hauteville street.

Oh, there is a great difference. You suppose one solitary man, or, what comes to the same thing, two men living together. This is not our world; the diversity of occupations and the intervention of merchants and money, change the question materially.

All this complicates transactions, but does not change their nature.

What! Do you propose to compare modern commerce to mere exchanges?

Commerce is but a multitude of exchanges; the real nature of the exchange is identical with the real nature of commerce, as small labor is of the same nature with great, and as the gravitation which impels an atom is of the same nature as that which attracts a world.

Thus, according to you, these arguments, which in Robinson's mouth are so false, are no less so in the mouths of our protectionists?

Yes; only error is hidden better under the complication of circumstances.

Well, now, select some instance from what has actually occurred.

Very well. In France, in view of custom and the exigencies of the climate, cloth is a useful article. Is it the essential thing to make it or to have it?

A pretty question! To have it, we must make it.

That is not necessary. It is certain that to have it some one must make it; but it is not necessary that the person or country using it should make it. You do not produce that which clothes you so well, nor France the coffee it uses for breakfast.

But I purchased my cloth and France its coffee.

Exactly, and with what?

With specie.

But you did not make the specie, nor did France.

We bought it.

With what?

With our products which went to Peru.

Then it is in reality your labor that you exchange for cloth and French labor that is exchanged for coffee?

Certainly.

Then it is not absolutely necessary to make what one consumes?

No; if one makes something else and gives it in exchange.

In other words, France has two ways of procuring a given quantity of cloth. The first is to make it, and the second is to make something else and exchange that something else abroad for cloth. Of these two ways, which is the best?

I do not know.

Is it not that which, for a fixed amount of labor, gives the greatest quantity of cloth?

It seems so.

Which is best for a nation, to have the choice of these two ways or to have the law forbid its using one of them at the risk of rejecting the best?

It seems to me that it would be best for the nation to have the choice, since in these matters it always makes a good selection.

The law which prohibits the introduction of foreign cloth decides, then, that if France wants cloth it must make it at home, and that it is forbidden to make that something else with which it could purchase foreign cloth?

That is true.

And as it is obliged to make cloth and forbidden to make something else just because the other thing would require less labor (without which France would have no occasion to do anything with it), the law virtually decrees that for a certain amount of labor France should have but 1 yard of cloth, making itself, when, for the same amount of labor, it could have had 2 yards by making something else.

But what other thing?

No matter what. Being free to choose, it will make something else only so long as there is something else to make.

That is possible; but I can not rid myself of the idea that foreigners may send us cloth and not take something else, in which case we shall be prettily caught. Under all circumstances this is the objection, even from your own point of view.

You admit that France will make this something else, which is to be exchanged for cloth, with less labor than if it had made the cloth itself?

Doubtless.

Then a certain quantity of its labor will become inert?

Yes; but people will be no worse clothed—a little circumstance which causes the whole misunderstanding. Robinson lost sight of it, and our protectionists do not see it, or pretend not to. The stranded plank thus paralyzed for fifteen days Robinson's labor, so far as it was applied to the making of a plank, but it did not deprive him of it. Distinguish, then, between these two kinds of diminution of labor, one resulting in privation and the other in comfort. These two things are very different, and if you assimilate them you reason like Robinson. In the most complicated, as in the most simple, instances the sophism consists in this: Judging of the utility of labor by its duration and intensity and not by its results, which leads to this economic policy, a reduction of the results of labor, in order to increase its duration and intensity.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, protectionism is not only the suggestion of the prostitution of public functions to private ends, and thus the mother of graft in very many ways, but it is the mother of State socialism and of a spirit of communism. It is the mother of them, because it plants and waters and develops to fruitage the idea that the citizen has a right to look to the Government for support and enrichment; because it undermines the old cardinal American principle that the citizen should support the State and not the State the citizen.

Mr. Chairman, if it be governmentally allowable to levy a tax on what I consume—an indirect tax—in order to increase somebody's dividend, or to create a dividend for somebody—an ironmaster, for example—or to increase the wage of somebody who is laboring, or to create for somebody who is laboring a wage (and the latter—pretense, as it is—is the strongest statement of the case for protectionism that has ever been made), then it is equally allowable to reach either of the same ends directly by taxing my land or horses and dividing the proceeds to the capitalists or laborers in the "protected" industry—paying it directly over to them out of the Treasury.

You say it "encourages industry!" Yes; it encourages my industry to the extent of requiring more work from me to pay the tax to keep up the other fellow's establishment! dead certain! The idea being once planted in the mind of the citizen that it is the duty of government, or that it is permissible for the Government, to make men in certain industries prosperous by use of the taxing power, then why not make prosperous other men in other industries? All come clamoring. And then why not make all those who are needy prosperous? What dreams of prosperity by legislation! It would simply be Tittlebat Titmouse's game of gammon over again, "to give everybody everything without taking anything from anybody."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have written what follows for a few sentences, because I have wanted to measure my words right here when I say; I would rather live in a country that taxes my property directly—houses and lands and cattle and poll—and pays out the proceeds directly once a week from the subtreasuries to all needy laborers working at less than a given wage—supposed to be a living wage—than to live under the present system. I would rather do it for two reasons: First, because I would know exactly how much I was paying, and now I do not; and, secondly, because I would know exactly who was getting what I paid in, and now I do not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I know quite well who does not get overmuch of it—the laborer—the pretended beneficiary.

I would rather, Mr. Chairman, be taxed directly 5 or 9 mills a year, and know that the money was given once a week to poor women in sweat shops, or to men and women in order that their children might be kept out of factories and mines, than to have myself and my laborer in my cotton field, black as he is, taxed indirectly on what he and I wear and eat, as we are now, on the pretense that the money goes dribbling through the hands of Carnegies, and Schwabs, and Cramps, and various steel-trust and glass-trust magnates, to these same laborers. If you want to give it to workingmen, give it to them. But see to it that they get it. If you want to tax me that they may earn a higher wage, tax me, but see that they get it. Let there be no lie in the belly of the act. Do not let the wrong man get it; do not dribble it through somebody who keeps it by the way. Do away with the pretended intermediary of your pretended charity.

Mr. Chairman, others may deceive themselves, but as for me, I see no difference between these two forms of state socialism. Nor do I see any difference between either one of them in kind (though, of course, I see some in degree) and the system that prevailed in the latter days of the Roman republic, the system of furnishing panem et circenses, of giving bread and circuses to the Roman populace. I will go further; I would rather be taxed directly to give bread and circuses to the laboring poor (or even to the idle poor, if only they were poor and not poor, by criminality), than be taxed indirectly to give French opera and turtle soup to those richer than I, who reward my patience under burden-bearing by charging me more for what they are able to make and sell me, by virtue of having taxed me, than they charge to the foreigner who buys from them. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You say all this is rank socialism, rank agrarianism, rank communism? So it is; and I am not in favor of any of it, of course. But I am more nearly in favor of it than of protectionism. It is at least what it is. It is honestly itself. There is no humbug nor pretense of other thing about it. Protectionism is equally rank socialism, rank agrarianism, rank communism, even under the pretext you make for it as a principle—namely, that you are taxing one man in order that another man may earn a higher wage. It is worse when you consider that its real aim, effect, and result is to tax one man that another may earn a higher dividend.

Now, it is not true that the purpose or effect of the system is to benefit labor. Abundant proof shows that it is not true and that it is not your intent—especially the fact that you have no protective tariff on labor itself. But if it were true, I would still come back to the gist of things and say that if it be an allowable governmental object, then let it be done so that I may know what I pay and know who will get it and when he gets it and who will not get it. You have taught socialism. You have planted the seed. You have poisoned the chalice. Watch and see if it does not return to your own lips. Go to the steel factories; go to the coal mines; go where they blow glass; go to the iron works of this country; go to the silk mills, and you will find that in minds of greedy soil have grown the fruitage from the seed which you have planted—from the concept that men have a right to demand legislative support, instead of supporting themselves. They are to-day demanding the direct system rather than the indirect system. Where do you find all the communism and socialism, aye, and anarchy, that you find in this country? Every bit of it is right around the crowded tenements, which are right under the shadows of your highly protected industries, where you have induced men to gather in unhealthy hordes. It encourages socialism in another way. It encourages men to leave the country and move to town, instead of living a mentally, morally, and physically healthy life upon the land; to be gathered and cooped up in great hordes in the tenements. In this hothoused atmosphere they have learned your lesson. They are beginning to preach it.

Mr. FASSETT. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I have been unable to gather how much better incidental protection is than if it is intentional protection?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I travel from here to the Treasury and incidentally step upon an ant by the way, it would be just the same thing to the ant as if I had stepped upon it on purpose; but not the same thing so far as I am concerned. In the one case I would have purposely crushed out the life of a poor, inoffensive creature I had met in going to the Treasury, not because I did not see it or could not avoid it, but because I wanted to; in the other case while I was going to the Treasury, and had the right to go to the Treasury, I had stepped upon it because I could not help it. I need not tell a gentleman of your astute intellect that a man hunting ants to kill will kill many more than he who is merely going to the Treasury. I want tariff taxes merely to go to the Treasury. The act of a man who stepped on an ant accidentally would not furnish an argument to lead a life of ant killing, nor suggest other forms of killing. I do not think your question or my answer adds much to the discussion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one or two more words, and I am through. You would say to me, "Would you revolutionize the whole system in a single act?" No; I would not; nor would I, had I been living in Rome in "bread-and-circus" days, have put an end to "bread and circuses" overnight, or by one act. Too many men and women, who were not responsible for the system under which they merely existed, would have been hurt; but I would, none the less, have sought to inaugurate—to make a beginning toward—a system whereby I could gradually and safely, but completely and forever, rid the body politic—and what is of more importance, the soul politic—of the "bread-and-circus" theory of Government—and all its corrupting and communistic and independence-undermining tendencies.

So in modern America I would work toward the Democratic ideal, toward the ultimate goal, which is a tariff for revenue only. I would gradually take down and not violently knock down the unnecessary artificial scaffolding. I have said protectionism is immoral and that it suggests further immoralities; that it is socialistic and suggests other forms of socialism. I want to show that it is inelastic as a fiscal system.

I shall take the liberty of using the language of another, both to save time and strength and because he amplifies the point better than I can.

I quote from the manuscript of Professor Conner, to whom I have already referred and the perusal of whose book on Tariff Reform I highly recommend when it shall be published, although he is a tariff-reform Republican and I am a tariff-reform Democrat, and in many respects we see things from widely separated standpoints. What of that? He talks much sense, and his aim is to cure abuses. Whosoever is not against us in this struggle is with us. In Chapter II of his forthcoming work he says:

THE NATURE OF FEDERAL FINANCE.

It is desired in this chapter to present two contrasts and the consequences flowing from them; the first briefly, the second at greater length. The first of these is the contrast between public and private finance; the second is the contrast between Federal, or national, finance and local, or State and municipal finance. The point of contrast in each case is to bring out the difference in their nature.

It is but natural at first thought to infer the nature of public finance from a false analogy to private finance, but a moment's reflection will show this to be fallacious. Many nations, indeed, have proceeded upon this false assumption, heaping up wealth in their treasuries and supposing thereby to add to their stability, permanence, and security, just as a man, for the same reason, adds to his estate. It lies in the nature of the physical man to become decrepit as old age advances, and for this period he must prepare. Not so, however, with the metaphysical state, for though it, too, may reach a period of decrepitude, it should proceed upon the assumption of perpetual life, each year's revenue sufficing for each year's needs, neither a surplus nor a deficit in any year's budget. [I am of the opinion that there ought always to be a small surplus—a "working margin"—to meet not unreasonable contingencies.—J. S. W.] An overflowing treasury is a menace to a state; to an individual it is not so, except he be a spendthrift. Hence a state is not to be regarded as a money-making institution, for it accumulates only to spend in public service. It does for its citizens collectively only those things which they can not do for themselves equally well individually. Its fiscal aim should be, assuming that it has a resourceful people and perfect revenue machinery, to have an empty treasury at the close of each fiscal year in all ordinary times of public tranquillity.

The second point of contrast mentioned, namely, as between Federal and local finance, is now to be noticed.

The revenue domain of any division of government is affected by the nature of its functions and the relationship thereof to its needs. Thus the needs of State and local governments are regular and constant, varying but little from year to year. Those needs should be met by a revenue system based upon property or income and not upon a fluctuating source.

* * * * * * *

Federal needs, on the other hand, change more frequently and more violently. By virtue of the exercise of its constitutional sovereignty the Federal Government is charged with the power to make and declare war. In consequence it bears the onus of the financial responsibility. Again, it is charged with the duty, exercised through Congress, of regulating coinage and controlling the currency. Thus the credit of the country is in its keeping as well as the enormous responsibility of providing a safe monetary system. It is incumbent upon it, therefore, to be able promptly to meet sudden financial and industrial changes in order to restore confidence and avert a panic. Again, the transactions of the Government are on a magnificent scale; and when a given task is to be undertaken or finished there is necessarily a change in the volume of revenue to be demanded or to be discontinued. Moreover, the national budget bears so large a proportion to the total currency of the country that it augments the danger of a financial stringency. Summing up what has just been said, it is evident that the chief difference between Federal and local finance is that the former must constantly be able to meet emergencies. It has its regular and constant needs, just as the local divisions, but there is a much larger element of uncertainty and fluctuation to be provided for.

This important conclusion certainly follows from the foregoing: That the Federal revenue system should be elastic, flexible, easily expansive to meet an exigency whether foreseen or unforeseen, and as easily contracted when that exigency is past. How the tariff has met and is now meeting this requirement we are to consider in the next chapter.

It was stated above that the aim in fiscal legislation should be to secure each year an exact balance of receipts and expenditures, neither surplus nor deficit. Manifestly in a budget of over five hundred millions, involving the handling of twice that sum, such an exact balance would be a miracle of luck as well as of good management. A surplus or a deficit of only a million or two in our national fiscal management would be much below the average deviation from an exact balance. Since, therefore, we are reduced to the practical necessity of choosing between a prospective deficit or a prospective surplus, we must inquire what are the considerations affecting such a choice.

Manifestly a surplus means on the face of it that more revenue has been collected than was needed—more, perhaps, than was voted or desired. Regarding it as a tax exacted from the citizens, it is purely an unjustifiable exaction, though perhaps unavoidable. The best justification of a surplus in any year is its unpreventability.

* * * * * * *

The fiscal machinery for such a great emergency as a war must be, like guns, ammunition, and battle ships, in readiness for instant use. The financier must know where additional revenue may be obtained—that should go without saying. Much more than this, he must have the machinery for collecting it in full operation in time of peace. The importance of this observation can not be overemphasized. The creation and installation of revenue-collecting machinery is not the work of a moment; it can not be done by act of Congress; it is an administrative evolution and may take years for its completion. Here, let us say, is a great need arising for double or even ten times the ordinary budget. The people are able and anxious to contribute, but owing to the lack of revenue machinery the burden is unequally distributed, the cost of collection is high, incompetent and dishonest officials have to be weeded out, the tax is unproductive, the disappointing results impair the public credit, and finally drastic attempts may be made to obtain revenue by debasing the currency. All this actually happened during our civil war.

It may seem superfluous to dwell upon so patent a proposition, but the excuse for doing so shall be the importance thereof and the aptness of our financial experience as illustration.

It is well known now that at the close of the Revolution there was a superabundance of coin in this country. The people were prosperous and resourceful. Both the English and the French armies were paying cash for their supplies, and the coin could not leave the country owing to the war embargo. At the close of the war the volume of specie exports was sufficient to alarm American statesmen, who declaimed loudly against the squandering of money upon foreign finery. But how about the Government at this time—that is a more familiar tale and needs no rehearsing. There was no national revenue system at this time—not a penny could be raised, all had to depend upon the voluntary contributions of the constituent parts. The wonder is that under such circumstances anything could be raised.

So far Professor Conner. What he says is well said.

I may add that formerly an income tax could have been resorted to in cases of emergency, leaving the balance of the fiscal system intact and undisturbed, or comparatively so, thus introducing, outside of the tariff system of taxation, an element of flexibility. Since the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring the income tax to be direct taxation, and therefore rendering the levying and collecting of it impracticable, it is all the more important that any tariff system which we may have should contain within itself the element of elasticity. It is self-evident almost that a protective tariff can not answer this condition. Its schedules are arranged so as to be prohibitive of importation in many regards, and so as, to be, more or less nearly, an approximate prohibition with regard to all schedules. It follows that additional revenues can not be obtained by raising the rates of a genuine protective tariff. That would result only in lessening revenues. True, import duties might be levied upon numerous articles not already taxed, but even that would present itself to the minds of orthodox protectionists as an attack upon "the system," and would cause all the interested beneficiaries of it to fly to its rescue. If, in order to increase the revenues accruing under a protective tariff, the rates were lowered, it would add business excitement to war excitement and antagonize powerful interests, whose aid, good will, and capital would be needed. As Professor Conner says, "the supreme danger of protection is that it is so hard to be shaken off or even diminished when the need of it has been outgrown." Witness our steel and iron, our leather and boot and shoe, and our window-glass schedules. It would be hard to diminish the rates, even when public stress and strain demanded more money for public defense and therefore a diminution of protective rates in order to get it.

Look at the other side of the picture. A revenue tariff, so adjusted as to obtain only the money actually needed in times of peace, is in the highest degree elastic as well as economy-encouraging. Why? Because the rates would not in peace times be placed at the maximum revenue point, but at a point lower than that. When an increase of revenue was required for war or other emergency purposes the duties could be raised up to, but not beyond, the maximum revenue point. I say not beyond, because the moment that point was passed revenues would decrease. This could be done without disturbing existing conditions, without creating industrial dislocation.

After the war or other emergency was passed the reduction of duties could, in turn, be made without a revolution of the entire fiscal system. To illustrate, say that the maximum revenue point on a given article (A) were 10 per cent, on another article (B) 20 per cent, on another article (C) 50, and on article D 80 per cent—that is, that these rates would indicate the points beyond which increased rate of duty levied and collected would not make up for loss of revenues caused by diminution in the volume of imports. If this were the case, then in times of peace, when only a moderate revenue was needed, the duty on A would be probably 5 per cent, on B 10, on C 25, and on D 40. Now, it is evident that you could increase the duty on A to anything short of 10 per cent, that on B to anything short of 20 per cent, that on C to anything short of 50 per cent, and that on D to anything short of 80 per cent, procuring at each step of the increase an increased revenue, while providing at the same time a little stimulation, but not enough to be harmful, to business. It is evident that there is a wide margin of revenue possibilities for increase and decrease alike between the extremes of minimum revenue rates and maximum revenue rates, and that, too, without revolutionary effect on commerce or industrialism. Not so with a protective tariff. Its rates are, to some extent—sometimes altogether—the guaranty of the stability of a "system;" false system, it is true, because artificial, but still a system. If the so-called "principle" of protection be adhered to, no reduction large enough to result in serious importation, and therefore in any considerable increase of revenue, can be looked for. Controlling interests, allied together and all wrapped up in "the system," would prevent. They would force war even to be carried on almost entirely by immense bond issues, mortgaging posterity, and by issues of legal-tender currency, resulting probably in a cessation of specie payments, and therefore entailing future "resumption," with all its necessary stringency and hardships. Rely upon it, the protected interests will be no less selfish and no less powerful in legislative halls in times of war than in those of peace. Under a revenue tariff, however, there are too few people vitally interested in any rate, or all rates, to enable them to form a controlling influence. Such interests as exist under a revenue tariff are natural, not artificial, and not dependent upon legislation, therefore not obstructive of legislation which is otherwise just or which is needed for fiscal purposes. So much for the question of elasticity.

One last thought in conclusion. We can, I think, learn a lesson from our neighbor to the north of us—Canada. In the United States, when a great combination of capitalists, controlling a product, violates all ethics by shocking exploitations, under the shelter of "the system," we have to wait, as in the anthracite coal case, until the cumbersome machinery of Federal legislation can be brought into play and a special act of Congress passed to repeal the duty, so that the exploitation may be stopped. The anthracite coal case was a peculiar one. Nothing less than the immense suffering and the acute revolt in the public mind could have forced a Republican Congress to apply the remedy, to wit, the repeal of the duty. They do things better in Canada. Section 18, clauses 1, 2, and 3, of the Canadian tariff act, reads as follows:

Whenever the governor in council has reason to believe that with regard to any article of commerce there exists any trust, combination, association, or agreement of any kind among manufacturers of such article or dealers therein to unduly enhance the price of such article, or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of the manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, the governor in council may commission or empower any judge of the supreme court or exchequer court of Canada, or of any superior court in any Province of Canada, to inquire, in a summary way, into and report to the governor in council whether such trust, combination, association, or agreement exists.

Clause 2 gives the powers of the commissioners.

Clause 3: If the judge reports that such trust, combination, association, or agreement exists, and if it appears to the governor in council that such disadvantage to the consumers is facilitated by the duties of customs imposed on a like article, when reported, then the governor in council shall place such article on the free list, or so reduce the duty on it as to give to the public the benefit of reasonable competition in such article.

By this act Canada virtually says to all men that, when protectionism has had the effect of breeding a trust, she will either none of it or less of it; that if the protection on an article has to be decreased, or even to go entirely, in order to kill a trust, it shall be decreased or shall go entirely, and for this purpose she in this act gives power and authority to the executive department of the government to meet the evil at once, and summarily, without waiting to convene the Canadian Parliament, and without waiting after that for the slow processes of careful legislation. It seems to me that she has set us an example well worth imitating.

I have tried to answer the gentleman from Iowa. I have tried to show what I believe—to wit, that protectionism is hurtful to the body politic and to the soul politic; that it is a breeder of immorality and state socialism, and that it is, as a fiscal system, from its nature inelastic and inflexible.

I thank the House for its courtesy and patience. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for an hour.

Mr. LAMB. I would like to make this statement. Between now and half past 3 the time was agreed to be divided equally between the two sides, and if the gentleman from Washington has one hour he will take from the Democratic side what belongs to them. I believe gentlemen on this side want to be just and fair in this matter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest that the committee do now rise and make a new arrangement as to the time we go into the five-minute debate. The gentleman from Mississippi has made a very interesting speech of four hours and some minutes long.

Mr. DALZELL. Four hours and fifteen minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest that course. I do not intend to take the management of it out of the hands of the gentlemen on the committee.

Mr. LAMB. I do not see the chairman on the other side.

Mr. DALZELL. I think we ought to have a chance for a hearing.

Mr. LAMB. I would say you have had more than your chance already. You have had thirty-five minutes more on your side already.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a fact, according to the time kept by the clerk at the desk. There is an hour and ten minutes left, and that time ought to be equally divided between the two sides. That is about forty minutes. The House has agreed to adjourn at half past 3 o'clock.

I think the general debate on the bill has been liberal and long, and there are other appropriation bills to come, when the matter can be thrashed out.

Mr. LAMB. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining time be equally divided between the two sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the remaining time be equally divided between the two sides. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] is recognized for half the balance of the time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me say that the naval appropriation bill follows immediately after this, and gentlemen who wish to speak will have plenty of opportunity then.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Mr. Chairman, I conceive that it is most unfortunate for me that it should come my turn to make a few remarks immediately upon the close of that brilliant speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. And that was indeed a brilliant speech of his. I think I may justly congratulate the gentleman upon that speech, because in the last seven years that I have been a Member of this House each and every time the gentleman has delivered that speech I think I have been able to note a decided improvement in added emphasis, an increased elegance of inflection, and far more eloquent gesture. And, sir, the perfection which that speech of his will have attained by the time it is heard by the next generation is a subject the pleasant contemplation of which absolutely overcomes me. [Laughter.]

HEBREWS, XIII, 8.

Once there was a man of God, and, lo, it came to pass that he was temporarily domiciled in one certain boarding house where the distinguishing characteristic of the daily menu was hash.

They had hash on workdays and hash on holidays, hash on week days and hash on Sundays, hash for breakfast, hash for dinner, and hash for supper.

After ye man of God had endured this changeless programme in silence for some time, one day, when the landlady passed him his usual plate of hash, as he received it he bowed his head reverently and murmured aloud: "Hebrews, thirteen, eight."

The lady of the house was much mystified thereby, and as soon as she could excuse herself she hastened to her room and took down the good book and tenderly blew the dust off of it, and then she turned over the pages to the thirteenth chapter of Hebrews and to the eighth verse thereof and read as follows:

"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

[Laughter.]

Sir, I have been in this House long enough, and heard that same speech often enough from the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], that whenever he rises to his feet in this House to speak I always bow my head reverently and say to myself:

"Hebrews, thirteen, eight."

[Prolonged laughter.]

However, I do not wish to be understood as criticising the gentleman's speech. I consider that there were at least two strong and masterful points about that speech, namely, latitude and platitude. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I will cheerfully admit that when any gentleman arises before this or any other assembly and attempts to justify and glorify the past record of the Democratic party he necessarily labors under unusual burdens, and no one ought intentionally to add to his embarrassment.

One of the gentleman's strongest points seemed to be in talking about the future, and in prophesying to the American people about what is going to happen hereafter. But, sir, the gentleman and his party are singularly weak when it comes to the matter of explaining to the American people some things that have occurred in this country in the not remote past.

The few remarks that I have to make to-day upon the tariff question will not be addressed to the imagination of the American people, but will be dedicated to their recollection and their memory. There is only one thing which may operate to bring the Democratic party into power in the future, and that is that the American memory may become a little frayed around the edges. But happily, sir, the minute the Democratic party gets into power then the seat of the American trousers becomes frayed, and then American memory revives in a corresponding degree. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] proclaimed loudly that his party was sure to win in the near future. I do not believe that is true; but if they do, it will not be altogether an unmixed evil. It may be hard on the country at large and the people in general, but it will vastly benefit the Republican party. The last victory which the Democratic party won in this country did more for the Republican party than an eternity of campaigning would have done. [Applause.] Gentlemen, it may be a little hard on the country to have you win, but the Republican party can stand it, because any temporary victory you might win on your present principles would bring to this country another unmeasured industrial calamity akin to the last one we had. And then the Democratic party would again go out of power and have to wait for another twenty-one years for a new crop of American "suckers" to mature. [Laughter and applause.]

THE GENTLEMAN FROM NEW YORK, MR. TOWNE.

During the course of his lengthy speech the gentleman from Mississippi became very tired, and some of the extracts from documents which he desired incorporated in his speech he had read aloud by another in order to save his own strength.

I was particularly interested to note that the distinguished gentleman, formerly from Minnesota and now a Member from New York [Mr. TOWNE], was called upon to read these extracts. This hydra-headed performance seemed all the more remarkable to me when I recalled the fact that only a few years ago that same gentleman [Mr. TOWNE] occupied a seat on this, the Republican, side of this House and was one of the ardent champions of a protective tariff. And when he bade farewell to the Republican party he announced that he only did so on the single issue of money. And yet, after affiliating with that party and indorsing one political heresy, the gentleman seems to have let all holds go and embraced all their heresies, including free trade. At any rate that was the conclusion I came to when I heard him read with such beautiful and polished diction the choice free-trade slush which his Democratic colleague from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] handed to him.

And as I meditated upon the singular downfall of my friend [Mr. TOWNE], I thought of the lines of that old poem:

> Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As to be hated needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

[Laughter.]

But be that as it may, I can frankly say that I greatly admire the distinguished ability of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNE]. He and I are warm personal friends and have been for years. And I am certainly fond of hearing him speak. He is a magnificent orator. And his voice—ah, sir, that is the superb and particular gift of his that has fairly driven me to despair with envy. That rich, rotund, mellifluous, oratorical voice of his is indeed matchless in quality. I have often wondered, sir, how the human voice could be cultivated to that point of admirable perfection that his has attained. And the only conclusion I could come to was that the use of one single voice in speaking for all political parties and on all sides of all questions has tended to cultivate the gentleman's voice to a point of perfection that the more modest of us can never hope to attain. [Great laughter.]

THE AMERICAN WHITTLER.

Mr. Chairman, one of the time-honored customs of all American citizens is to whittle with a jackknife when they have nothing else to do. Just where this ancient custom had its origin I am not able to say. Its origin is lost in the dim mists of American antiquity. It even antedates "the crime of '73!" [Laughter.]

There never was as much whittling done in America since the day that George Washington amputated the cherry tree with his hatchet as was done by idle American citizens between the years of 1892 and 1896. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

As a "whittling period" I undertake to say that during those years we broke the world's record. Every empty dry-goods box along every abandoned highway of American commerce was marked with these peculiar and distinguished American hieroglyphics. Every hitching rack in front of every corner grocery store was marked and scarred by the "Ancient Sons of Rest," who had nothing to do but to whittle and to yell for Bryan and for panic! [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In the autumn of the good old Democratic year of 1896 I campaigned through the State of Washington against the continuance of the free-trade policy that had brought us to industrial disaster, and likewise campaigned against free silver—that crazy complement of free trade that would have added complete financial ruin to our other woes. [Applause.]

In the little city of Centralia, in the State of Washington, I distinctly remember that a large telephone pole stood at the corner at the junction of the two main streets. Around the base of that pole there daily gathered a vast and idle horde of good but misguided men, whose chief occupations were reading "Coin's Financial School" and discussing "the crime of '73!"

From the top of that old pole floated a monster Bryan banner just exactly 262 feet long—one foot for each one of the $262,000,000 worth of gold bonds that that panic Administration had issued to keep itself afloat! [Laughter on the Republican side.]

I stood there on the outskirts of that throng and looked about me. And on every side as far as the jaundiced eye could see, in the midst of a land of natural plenty, I beheld business wrecks, financial ruin, and industrial decay—and above it all brooded the gaunt and somber specter of famine. There was not a single human being within sight that had a job or was on a pay roll. They were all whittling! And that old pine pole, two feet thick, had a circle cut around the base of it half way through—and every gash represented a Populist vote! [Laughter.]

Sir, it was my fortune to again visit that little city of Centralia in the month of August in the glorious year of 1905. The old pole was still there—and it was the only thing in sight that looked natural. Everything else had changed. Perhaps the reason the town had changed so much was because all of the inhabitants had more "change!" [Laughter.] That slumbering old town had been touched by the quickening hand of renewed industrial life, even as the sleeping inmates of the old castle were wakened when the wand of the prince touched the eyes of the sleeping princess.

Out of sheer reverence for that old pole I walked up to take a look at the old Bryan landmark; and as sure as I am alive there was posted on the base of that old pole the advertisement of a sawmill company asking for fifty laboring men immediately. Ye gods and little fishes! If a man had put up a sign on that pole in 1896 advertising for one man to help dig the grave of some victim who had starved to death, a multitude of idle men would have torn that pole down trying to get there first. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MACON. Will the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] state what was the worst year in that period—that is, between the years of 1892 and 1896?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is a most melancholy subject for reflection at best. If my experience is to be taken as a criterion it was all very bad.

Mr. MACON. Does not the gentleman from Washington know that the worst year was the year of 1893?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No, Mr. Chairman. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] that I not only do not know that to be a fact, but on the contrary I do know it to be a fact that it was in the year of 1894 that the panic reached its height—after your party, sir, was in power.

Mr. MACON. Doesn't the gentleman from Washington know that there was the greatest financial depression in the year of 1893?

Mr. CUSHMAN. No, sir; I do not know anything of that kind. That was what you and your party tried to demonstrate to the American people in the political campaign of 1896, and on that issue you and your party were kicked out of power by the people, and you haven't got back since. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MACON. It was not on that issue alone; that had a very small part to do with it. It was on the silver question.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the American people also settled the silver question just exactly opposite the manner in which the Democratic party insisted that it ought to be settled, and the country, sir, is entirely content with the solution of that question, too. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has just closed a speech of more than four hours' length, in which he has discoursed ably and eloquently and theoretically upon the absolute fairness and complete success of that system which is called "a tariff for revenue only."

I do not mean to speak in any contemptuous sense when I say that a complete and overwhelming answer to him, in my judgment, could be made by asking him one question, as follows: "You and your party tried this system in 1894, when you enacted the Wilson 'tariff for revenue only' law. How did it work then?" It didn't work at all. That is the truth about it.

Mr. Chairman, my observation and personal experience in regard to that thing called "a tariff for revenue only" is that under a practical trial of it we never get the revenue. No; we never get the revenue. What do we get? Why, we get the "only;" that's what we get. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

We are continually told from the Democratic side of this House how beautifully this free-trade theory is going to work out in the future if we will only let them try it. What I want to ask is, Why did it not work successfully when you did try it in 1894 and 1895?

We have the same country now that we had then. We have the same people now we had then. We have the same soil beneath us and the same atmosphere all about us. If it was not a success then, what makes any man think it is going to be a success if you try it again?

There seems to be a disposition at present in the ranks of the Democratic party to crowd to the front the free-trade idea, or at least the idea of tariff revision.

We are continually told how much cheaper things are sold in other countries, and how much cheaper all articles can be bought abroad than at home. And this is quoted as a reason why we should adopt a domestic policy which would, in effect, turn the American market over to the foreigner.

Upon this general subject I desire to submit a few observations.

WHY GIVE THE FOREIGNER OUR MARKET?

Why should the foreigner be given the American market place? The foreigner builds no home here; he tills no soil here; he pays no taxes here. Why should he be permitted to sell the product of his labor in a country that he does not help support and to which he owes no allegiance, and in competition with the labor of the American citizen, whose little all is wrapped up in this nation? It is the American citizen who pays the taxes of this country in time of peace and fights its battles in time of war.

In the plain and homely philosophy of Abraham Lincoln I find this utterance, the words of which ought to be emblazoned above the gateways of this nation. Lincoln said: "This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it." [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is a sentiment that ought to awaken at least a faint echo even in the hearts of the men who persistently advocate a system the legitimate effect of which is to trade off the employment and the prosperity of American citizenship to the aliens and paupers of other lands.

Let no man say that I have no sympathy for the poor of other lands, because I have.

The philosophy of American manhood and the genius of American statesmanship raises no objection to the outside world climbing up to the exalted industrial and economic level of America; but, in the name of 90,000,000 of industrious, prosperous, and patriotic people, we protest that we shall not be dragged down to their level. [Applause.]

THE UNITED STATES.

A small and narrow country, with few resources and limited productions, may be forced by the very logic of environment to purchase many of the necessities of her people abroad.

But pause for a moment, if you please, and sketch in your mind a geographical map and an industrial picture of the United States—reaching practically into the three zones of the Northern Hemisphere and stretching wide between earth's two mightiest oceans; possessing almost every resource and producing almost every product that the breast of nature and the genius of man, working in harmony, have ever produced; and peopled with a race of 90,000,000, whom statisticians and scientists tell us—measured by their energy, their genius, and their productive capacity—are equal to almost twice that number of people on any other portion of the habitable globe.

Sir, why should a nation of this description and a people of this character sit idly down in the midst of plenty and become dependent upon the productive capacity of any other race beneath the stars? [Applause.]

"CAPTURING THE MARKETS OF THE WORLD."

Every now and then you will hear some patriotic but misguided American citizen saying that he wishes to see the tariff reduced so that our nation can capture the markets of the world.

In answer to that hysterical clamor a few years ago the Democracy of this nation lowered the tariff, and we tried the experiment. And did we capture the markets of the world then? Oh, no. As my friend from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] says, "the reason we did not was because we were too hungry to get that far from home." [Applause and laughter on Republican side.] And I might add as a corollary to that proposition—that we didn't have anything to take with us.

Instead of America penetrating the markets of the world, the markets of the world penetrated the vitals of American industry.

Those were the years when our foreign trade was the least, and our industrial situation at home the most deplorable. And now, in the height of a protective-tariff era, we are capturing the markets of the world from behind the fortifications of protected and prosperous industry. [Applause.]

Now, what are the best methods and means by which to extend the foreign trade and commerce of this nation? The first essential is to become the master of our own home market.

You never heard of an army marching very far into an enemy's country, did you, unless they had a base of supplies behind them? Well, that is a rule that works in peaceful commercial conquest as well as in military warfare.

If we throw our home market open and let other nations invade and capture it, then the business of the home manufacturer is destroyed, and the employment of the home workingman is gone. And when you put the American manufacturer and the American laborer out of business, you likewise destroy the prosperity of the agricultural producer who leans upon them. And when you have destroyed the prosperity of those three classes then you have bankrupted your nation at home. Do you think that the nation is then in a good condition to go out and battle for the markets of the world?

No. A large and flourishing home market, diversified resources, and a high state of prosperity among all our people here at home—these are the engines and the weapons that enable a nation and its people to wage a peaceful and successful battle for the conquest of foreign markets.

There are some so-called "economists" and self-styled statesmen who seem to think that the proper way to fit a nation for industrial conquest abroad is to first bankrupt and impoverish it at home. But my philosophy and the history of the world teach me that industrial paupers and manufacturing mendicants make mighty poor commercial travelers with which to capture the markets of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Washington [Mr. CUSHMAN] yield for a question?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Well, I have but little time; but——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. All right; go ahead.

Mr. BYRD. Will the gentleman from Washington yield to me for one question? You stated a few moments ago, as I understood it, that during the reign of the Wilson bill we as a nation had nothing to export, did you not?

Mr. CUSHMAN. Oh, no; not at all. There has never been a time since this Government was founded that we did not have something to export. I spoke in a comparative sense when I spoke of our foreign trade being less then than it is now. I stated that our foreign trade was at that time in a more deplorable condition by far than it is now.

Mr. BYRD. Did you not state, further, that it was like an army leaving its base of supplies; that we would not venture on the high seas, meaning that we had but little to export; did you not say that?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I fear the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BYRD] did not understand me correctly. What I said in substance was that when we as a nation adopted a free-trade policy, or tariff-for-revenue policy, as was the case under the Wilson bill, that the effect upon the general prosperity of our people at home was ruinous, and they were in effect reduced to poverty. And being in a condition of poverty they were not then in a condition to go out and battle for the markets of the world. What I have stated is more especially true of the manufacturer than it is of the farmer. We produce in this country a surplus of agricultural products; what we do not consume at home is bound to go abroad to market. But when we have prosperous conditions here at home we consume a greater proportion of our agricultural products than when we are having a panic.

Mr. BYRD. You did not say that, then, as I understood you.

Mr. CUSHMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was——

Mr. BYRD. What did you say on that point? If we had nothing to export, then what did we do when we had been for thirty years under high protection?

Mr. CUSHMAN. I'll tell you what we have been doing for thirty years under high protection. We have been prospering as no other nation on the face of God's footstool has prospered. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRD. Did you not say just now; did I not understand you to say that we did not have anything to live on?

Mr. CUSHMAN. We have always had an abundance of agricultural products in this country to live on. But there have been times when the people of the nation did not have money to buy what they needed. And when that occurred the farmer who had these products to sell likewise became poor. Poverty is like many another disease, it is both infectious and contagious. I was endeavoring in my feeble way to show that during periods of poverty in this nation all the people of the nation suffered from poverty, and that people who were poverty stricken at home could not expect to go out and make as successful battle for foreign markets as if they were prospering at home.

THE DECLINE OF ENGLAND.

When I was a child it was ultrafashionable in free-trade circles in this country to continually picture the prosperity of England and assert to the unthinking that a protective tariff in this country was bankrupting the United States and enriching England. Some way or other that argument does not seem to be as much of a stage favorite now as it was in former days. Other political fairies are before the footlights now.

In the last decade the wealth and the production of America have grown beyond the fondest dreams of those other days, and the melancholy tale of England's lost prosperity and prestige is the most tragic and pathetic story of the commercial world.

When the Democratic party was last in power in this nation, then there was the hum of industry in the factories of England and prosperity among the workingmen of Manchester and Sheffield and Cardiff.

But at the same time in America a vast horde of our own unemployed and destitute formed into the ranks of "Coxie's army" and the "Commonwealers," and in ragged, pathetic procession they marched down upon this the Capitol of their country, and uttered their protests within the shadow of its mighty Dome.

To-day, while we are under the rule of the Republican party, the daily press tells us of the mighty army of the unemployed of England, in hunger and in rags marching through the streets of the citadel of England, and giving voice to their lamentations at the gates of Hyde Park.

But to-day, here at home, the mighty army of American labor marches forth to fairer fields and richer rewards than ever known before. [Applause.]

Sir, the last few years have brought forth a great outcry from England, and to-day Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, her foremost statesman, is pleading with his people to adopt a protective tariff as their sole salvation. And at the same time a few half-baked statesmen on this side of the ocean want us to adopt the policy that has bankrupted England and discard the policy that has enriched us. [Loud applause.]

Our nation has been prosperous since the year of 1897. No truthful man can deny that. From the very hour of the election of President McKinley there was a gradual uplift in all the industrial conditions of this nation. Why was there an uplift?

Because, sir, the manufacturer knew that the dynamite of free trade was not going to blow up his factory; because the capitalist knew that the hand of repudiation could not destroy his contribution to the realm of industry [applause], and because the laborers of this nation once more saw the sun shining through the clouds, and their multiplied millions once again formed into the ranks and battalions of labor's peaceful army and moved out again to occupy the vast and fruitful plain of American industry. [Applause.]

CLAMS AS A DIET.

My memory harks back to the days when the Democratic party was in full control of this Government. What kind of times did we have then? There is only one way that I can describe the conditions that then existed: Times got just as bad as they could possibly be, and remained that way for a long time, and then they got worse. [Laughter.]

It was a most fortunate circumstance for me that in those days of panic and starvation that I lived in the city of Tacoma, on the shore of the ocean, because along the seashore there is always an abundance of raw clams. [Laughter.] Whenever the tide is out the table is set. [Laughter.] And if Almighty God had not made that wise and beneficent provision I would never have been able to live through that last Democratic Administration. [Laughter.]

And, sir, I pledge you my word that during the last Administration of Grover Cleveland I ate clams, and ate clams, and ate clams till my stomach rose and fell in harmony with the tides. [Great laughter and applause.]

And, Mr. Chairman, when I look abroad over my nation to-day and behold its boundless prosperity I have that faith in the American people that assures my heart that they will not turn their backs in ingratitude upon the substance of a prosperity that is as general and as genuine as the all-pervading air, and follow off after the polished language but unfruitful promises of a political acrobat from Mississippi.

A TOTAL ECLIPSE.

Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy at school, years and years ago, I studied the rudiments of astronomy, the science of the planets and the stars. I distinctly remember that I was greatly interested in that peculiar phenomena, the eclipse. And particularly so after my teacher informed me that it could always be figured out in advance to a mathematical certainty just when a total eclipse was going to occur.

Well, sir, I lived to see one total eclipse in this country that wasn't down on the books. I lived to see one total eclipse which the astrologers and astronomers of earth never foresaw or foretold. I lived to see the dense, opaque, and bulky body of Grover Cleveland and the allied Democracy move slowly across the face of the sun of American prosperity, and instantly every legitimate industry under the Stars and Stripes went into a condition of total eclipse 365 times as long and 40 times as black as any celestial phenomenon ever dreamed of or foretold by any mundane star gazer. [Great laughter and applause.]

And I may say, Mr. Chairman, when that total eclipse occurred I quit studying astronomy and began studying domestic economy and the science of American statesmanship. [Applause.]

When I say that the welfare of this nation and the prosperity of its people are best served and promoted by the protective-tariff policy, I don't ask any man to take my word for it. I point to the history of this nation and the varying experiences of its people. I point out to you the last seven years of the history of this nation—like unto the seven fat years of which Joseph prophesied and foretold unto Pharaoh.

Then I point back to the four years that preceded those seven years—the four years that this nation experienced under the Administration of Grover Cleveland. During the first two of those four years we were under the threat of free trade and during the last two we were actually under free trade.

Those were the four lean years, if you please. Ah, yes. Neither Joseph in his wisdom nor Pharaoh in his nightmare ever dreamed of anything like that period. [Laughter.]

And yet those were four years in which bountiful crops blessed the nation. There was no pestilence in the air. There was no blight upon the harvest. The sun didn't cease to shine and the rain didn't cease to fall. American muscle didn't wither nor American genius fade. The laws of nature and of nature's God were not suspended during those four years. There existed every reason why those four years should have been as prosperous as the years before them or the years after them, except that labor had been knocked in the head, the manufacturing business destroyed, and the productive capacity of this nation crippled by an academic and asinine free-trade law, under the operation of which men were unable to prosper. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if it is in order to ask that the gentleman's time be extended?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the arrangement only thirty-five minutes remain, and those thirty-five minutes are given to the other side.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL.]

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I discuss some features of the present bill. There has been a great deal said in the course of this discussion about protection. I wish to appeal to you, sir, and to the Members of this House, for protection to one of the greatest industries of the section of the country that I represent—the cattle industry of the South, which is now menaced most seriously by the Texas cattle fever.

As a result of that disease the South—and by the South I mean not only what we generally have in mind when we speak of the South, but the entire southern portion of this Union, from the Atlantic to the Pacific—is caused an annual loss of $63,250,000, according to the report of Doctor Mohler, Chief of the Pathological Bureau of the Agricultural Department. This terrible disease affects practically all the cattle of the southern country, and because of its ravages and the danger of the importation of cattle from that section to other parts of the country our Government in 1889 established a strict quarantine, and no cattle can come from a point south of that quarantine to a point north without being subjected to the strictest quarantine regulations. This line is over 5,000 miles long. It extends from a little north of Norfolk, Va., across the State of Virginia, through northern North Carolina, part of Georgia, the southern part of Tennessee, northward into a small part of Kentucky, then south again, west between Arkansas and Missouri, then in a southwesterly direction through Oklahoma, Indian Territory, and Texas; thence along the southern boundary of Arizona and New Mexico; thence along the eastern boundary of California and west to the Pacific, taking in about a third of California—upward of 5,000 miles in length.

As I remarked, no cattle can come from a point south of that line without being subjected to the most stringent quarantine regulations. As a result of that Texas fever, it is estimated by the most careful and expert scientists that every full-grown bovine in that country fails by fully 200 pounds to reach its normal development. Now, as I stated before, Doctor Mohler, one of the eminent scientists of the Agricultural Department, says, in a bulletin issued recently, to which I call the attention of every Member of this House, that the South loses annually $63,250,000 from the ravages of the cattle tick. Some of our southern scientists claim that the damage is much greater annually. Mr. August Mayer, a very prominent agriculturist and cattle raiser in Louisiana, says that the annual loss from the cattle tick is $150,000,000.

Now, gentlemen, this is a terrible handicap on a very great industry of our nation. Doctor Mohler says that the loss amounts to 16 per cent annually. There are over 15,000,000 cattle in the portions of our Union that are affected by this cattle tick, and 16 per cent loss on that number of cattle, as you see, is a very large amount.

Several years ago because of this Texas cattle fever Germany placed an embargo on the importation of live cattle from this country. Because of this tick fever every animal raised in the South and brought north for sale suffers a diminution in value of from one-quarter to one-half a cent per pound, and as the northern market is the best market for our cattle that means that every animal of the South suffers a loss in value of from one-fourth to one-half of a cent per pound because of this cattle tick.

Now, sir, does this interest the people of the South only? No. Anything that causes a diminution of national wealth of $63,250,000 a year interests the people of the entire Union. Mind you, sir, that is the lowest estimate—$63,250,000 a year—while the highest is $150,000,000, and a fair average is perhaps $100,000,000. Does it interest the northern grower of pure-bred cattle? Undoubtedly; because the southern people are trying all the time to introduce these pure-bred cattle from the North. They are introducing them in large numbers, and would gladly introduce more; but when these pure-bred cattle are carried South they invariably take this fever and a very large percentage of them die from it. Consequently it does not pay us to introduce these pure-bred cattle, and northern growers lose this magnificent field for the sale of their cattle.

Now, what do we propose to do about this? The National Agricultural Department and the State departments of agriculture have been investigating it for some years, and have decided that the cattle tick can be eradicated and destroyed; that this quarantine line can be pushed south to the Gulf of Mexico; that this can be done at a reasonable cost, and the southern people and the people of southern California are asking Congress to assist in doing it. In the bill now under discussion is a provision appropriating $65,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to undertake experimental work in cooperation with State authorities in eradicating the tick transmiting southern cattle fever.

We ask, Mr. Chairman, that that amount be raised to at least $100,000. We think that $65,000 is too small a sum, considering the magnitude of the interests involved, and considering the immense scope of country which this quarantine line now covers. And I wish to say, sir, in passing, that it now costs our Government between fifty and sixty thousand dollars a year to maintain this quarantine line. If we could eradicate the tick, if we could drive it into the Gulf of Mexico, we would not only save to the people of the southern portion of our Union between $63,000,000 and $150,000,000 a year, but we would save this annual sum now being appropriated to maintain the quarantine line of between $50,000 and $60,000. So, as a business proposition, it will certainly pay us to undertake this. The States below the quarantine line are doing their best to eradicate this tick. They are investigating in every way; they are moving with unity and accord. But, sir, this question is beyond the power of the States. This quarantine line, as I have explained to you, extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. It is truly a national question, because it is beyond State lines, and because the quarantine line was established, not by the States, but by the National Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Has there been any substantial progress made by the experiments you have had down there stopping the progress of this disease among your cattle?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Why, yes, I think there has been substantial progress, but unfortunately we did not understand this subject until very recently. Our scientists have only recently come to a thorough understanding of it, and it is impossible for the States to handle this, as I said, because when they eradicate the ticks in any given area it is not in the power of the States to move the quarantine line below that area, but it is in the power of the National Government, and therefore we want the cooperation of the Government.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I fully appreciate that and quite agree with the gentleman, for many of the southern cattle come just across the quarantine line into my own State.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. And endanger your cattle.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Endanger our cattle, many thousands of them, every year.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Right on that line, a Member of this House from the State of Kentucky told me a few moments ago that one of his constituents had bought some tick-infested cattle in the city of Cincinnati about three years ago and taken them home to Kentucky; that they died, and not only they, but the balance of the herd, causing him a loss of thousands of dollars, and all due to this cattle tick.

Mr. TIRRELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. Certainly.

Mr. TIRRELL. Is it not a fact that very little is known about the tick; that the Government experts themselves can not tell how long it takes to germinate them?

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. No; they have determined exactly how long it takes to germinate them. They understand that thoroughly, my dear sir; a great deal better than they understood the foot-and-mouth disease; and you remember a few years ago we appropriated $500,000—not a paltry $65,000—to eradicate the foot-and-mouth disease in New England, and our magnificent Secretary of Agriculture went to work vigorously, and at an expense of $300,000 very promptly stamped out the foot-and-mouth disease from New England.

Now, we do know about this cattle tick. The Agricultural Department has determined to eradicate it. Our own scientists have determined to eradicate it, but our farmers do not know how. We must educate them. It is a long process to educate the people who live along 5,000 miles of boundary, and in a territory covering several hundred thousand square miles.

Mr. TIRRELL. I agree with the gentleman in all he has said, but I wish to say that I have had occasion to investigate this matter, and I have found that the Government experts vary from thirteen or fourteen days to twenty-one days in the germination of the tick, as communicated from one animal to another.

Mr. RANSDELL of Louisiana. I will not have time to discuss the scientific feature of it, but if you will read this bulletin by Doctor Mohler, gotten out recently, and will read the hearings had before the Agricultural Committee on the 6th of February last, where Doctor Butler, of North Carolina; Doctor Morgan, of Tennessee; Doctor Soule, of Virginia, and Doctor

Dalrymple, of Louisiana, and many other eminent scientists discussed this question, you will find that they practically agree on this question. There is a little difference in the number of days, just as fever affects one man for a certain length of time and another man for another length of time, but the disease is well understood; and if we can get the active cooperation of the National Government we can in a few years entirely eradicate it. Our southern scientists are a unit on this proposition, and our Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, says that if he is given the money "he will drive the tick out of the South" just as he drove the foot-and-mouth disease out of New England, and as he is now driving out the scab in sheep and the mange among cattle in the Western States. He earnestly asks for $100,000 to begin this great work, and when we consider the magnitude of the interests involved and the vast area of country infested by the tick, together with the great length of the quarantine line, that seems like a very small sum.

The large conference of Congressmen and southern agriculturists held here on the 14th day of February last passed unanimous resolutions asking $200,000 for this purpose; the commissioners of agriculture of the South at their meeting in Richmond Va., November, 1905, asked $500,000; the American Veterinary Medical Association at its meeting in Cleveland, Ohio, August, 1905, asked "substantial Federal assistance to the Southern States in their effort to exterminate the greatest present menace to the cattle interest of a large part of our country;" the Interstate Association of Live Stock Sanitary Boards, at Guthrie, Okla., September, 1905, passed the following strong resolutions:

Whereas the Federal Government, in the exercise of its duties in protecting and fostering the live-stock industry of the nation, has expended large sums of public money in the successful control and eradication of such diseases as contagious pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, scabies, etc.; and

Whereas the southern cattle tick, tick fever, and the Federal quarantine restrictions cause much greater loss to southern cattlemen than the diseases above named ever caused the Northern States; and

Whereas the cattle tick and the resulting Federal quarantine restrictions are the greatest obstacles to the development of the cattle industry of the South; and

Whereas the work of tick extermination already done demonstrates that it is entirely feasible to eradicate the cattle tick: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting that the time has arrived for active and substantial assistance and cooperation from the Federal Government with the Southern States in their effort to exterminate the southern cattle fever tick; and the Oklahoma Cattlemen's Association, at Oklahoma City in March last (1906), asked for $500,000. Moreover, Doctor Melvin, Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry, Agricultural Department, concurs with Secretary Wilson in thinking $100,000 a proper sum to begin this fight.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I earnestly hope that the bill will be amended before it reaches the President, and $100,000 be appropriated for this most laudable purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HIGGINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11348. An act granting an increase of pension to Cynthia Cordial, now Vernon;

H. R. 14227. An act granting an increase of pension to Anna C. Bassford;

H. R. 12407. An act granting an increase of pension to Robert Bivans;

H. R. 12888. An act granting an increase of pension to Jacob Sannar;

H. R. 12415. An act granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Bodkin;

H. R. 12019. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry Jacob Fox;

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LAMB. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, let us come back to our moorings.

As we are considering in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, which carries with it an appropriation of $6,880,300, besides $320,000 for the cotton-boll weevil, gypsy and brown-tail moth, and the Texas cattle-tick emergencies, which appropriation asked is an increase of $187,610 over the appropriation of the last fiscal year, it is well to consider whether this appropriation is commensurate with the important industries which it seeks to foster. A daily New York paper yesterday criticised this bill as being extravagant.

The agricultural industry is the backbone and sinew, the mainstay and support, of all other industries. Without it the railroads would be idle, the banks would be useless, the factories stopped, the merchant, the lawyer, the physician, and all other occupations would be devoid of resources.

The corn crop during last year aggregated in value $1,216,000,000; hay, $605,000,000; cotton, $575,000,000; wheat, $525,000,000; oats, $282,000,000; potatoes, $138,000,000; barley, $58,000,000; tobacco, $52,000,000; sugar cane and sugar beets, $50,000,000; rice, approximately $14,000,000; butter and milk, $665,000,000; poultry products, $500,000,000. Horses and mules in the United States last year were valued at $1,452,000,000; milch cows, $482,000,000; other cattle, $662,000,000; sheep and swine, $283,255,000. These values alone aggregate $7,559,255,000, not including goats and other animals on the farm, peanuts, sorghum, peas, melons, fruits, berries, vegetables, and a multitude of other commodities produced upon the farm.

It can not, then, be deemed extravagant when an appropriation of only $7,200,300 is asked to maintain the Agricultural Department for this fiscal year, when we consider that for the last fiscal year there was expended for the legislative department of the Government, $11,748,459.59; for the executive department, $3,853,914.79; State Department, $1,517,492.91; Treasury Department, $70,725,731.97; War Department, $123,670,023.90; Navy Department, $115,908,324.27; Interior Department, $161,413,100.12; Post-Office Department, $17,284,522.68; Department of Commerce and Labor, $9,322,385.94; Department of Justice, $684,580.49. There was spent for pensions alone last year $141,773,964.57.

Mr. Chairman, in the ten minutes which are allowed me, the parts of this bill to which I desire to call particular attention are the appropriations asked for in the interest of the destruction of the Mexican cotton-boll weevil in the Southern States and the cattle tick and in support of the upbuilding of the roads of the country. In the emergency appropriation $105,000 are asked to be appropriated for the extermination of the Mexican cotton-boll weevil, and $65,000 for the extermination of the cattle ticks, and as a basis for experimental good roads $60,000. These appropriations asked are so reasonable, and, in fact, meager compared with the vast results to be accomplished that there could certainly be no hesitancy on the part of any Member of this House in voting for these appropriations.

THE MEXICAN COTTON-BOLL WEEVIL.

The estimated loss in cotton alone last year from the ravages of the boll weevil in Texas and Louisiana amounted to 450,000 bales, representing a value, including the seed, of $22,000,000.

The weevil has spread over an area of 100,000 square miles in Texas and Louisiana, and has now reached a point in Louisiana within 40 miles of the Mississippi River, and is going eastward and northeast at the rate of 50 miles each year. It is carrying terror and destruction in its wake, and ere long its ravages will aggregate in dollars and cents the recent terrible catastrophe on the western shores of this continent.

About one-third of the cotton acreage of the United States is now infested with the boll weevil. The Government officials in the Bureau of Entomology are not only teaching the farmers how to make more cotton by cultural methods in spite of the boll weevil, but are encouraging them to diversify their crops and to cultivate on the intensive plan, resulting in enormous yields compared with former methods. The money will be profitably invested for which this appropriation calls.

The devastation caused by the Mexican cotton-boll weevil makes it necessary for those engaged in agriculture in the cotton-growing States to look to some other source of revenue than cotton.

THE CATTLE TICK.

Heretofore the raising of cattle in the South has received very little attention outside of the State of Texas; but if it were not for the destruction of cattle by the Texas fever, caused by the cattle tick, and the fact that the tick itself seriously damages cattle where fever is not produced by it, the cattle industry in the South would be a source of tremendous profit.

There is no part of this great country where cattle can be raised more cheaply and with greater profit, if the tick is eliminated.

The cattle tick causes a loss to the agriculturists of the South of at least $100,000,000 annually, and the estimate of $150,000,000 is not unreasonable.

The first estimate of $100,000,000 is made by the officials of the United States Government, and the estimate of $150,000,000 by Mr. August Mayer, of Shreveport, La., who personally has lost $10,000 within four years from the cattle tick. He has made vast research into the question, and I wish to give you the benefit of his investigations:

THE POSSIBLE PROGENY OF ONE FEMALE TICK.

In the Gulf States four generations will be often hatched in one season. Say we have two eggs carried over the winter that hatch by April 15 a male and female. This female will have become engorged and laid 3,000 eggs by May 15, which will have hatched by June 15. One thousand five hundred of these seed ticks will be females, and will have become engorged and laid 1,500×3,000=4,500,000 by July 15. By August 15 these eggs will have hatched; one-half females equals 2,250,000 by September 15 will have engorged and laid 2,500,000× 3,000=6,750,000,000, which will hatch by October 15. One-half of these being females—that is, 3,375,000,000—will engorge and drop irregularly and go through the winter as adults, or will lay eggs that will pass through the winter.

Of course this can not happen, as such a number of parasites would destroy their hosts, and the species would thus destroy itself. Nature does not work that way. To preserve the species she destroys a goodly number of all broods, and thus preserves the host and tick. But the figures show that if the host is furnished the ticks will multiply so enormously as to endanger the existence of the host; i. e., it is quite possible for the ticks to kill the cattle outright.

THE DANGERS OF SMALL PASTURES ON THE FARM.

Stocking these pastures to their full capacity always means ticks in ruinous numbers. Where cattle are confined to a certain tract, especially where wooded or spotted with shade trees, they habitually gather in certain places, here in the forenoon and there in the afternoon; they may be found at certain favorable resting places every day. In summer time, when the flies are bad, the whole herd may be found together in the deepest shade in the woods. These favored and regularly frequented spots become extremely infested and remain so the whole year round, and it is very evident that the cattle when lying down here must become literally covered with the seed ticks.

THE DRAIN ON THE ANIMAL BY TICK INFESTATION.

An engorged female tick weighs about 5 grains; 1,500 average size ticks will weigh 1 pound; nearly all these consist of blood drawn from the host during two or three days, the period of inflation of the tick. Three hundred thousand ticks, which number may be permanently carried by a good-sized animal during the height of the tick season, will draw during a couple of weeks 200 pounds of blood from its body; and since four broods may mature upon one animal, it will be seen that the ticks may deprive the beast in one season of 800 pounds of its substance! Since a growing animal can put on 400 pounds of flesh on pasture during one season, it can be readily perceived why it is that cattle on the richest pasture, when the same is tick infested, may grow poorer from day to day, or even starve to death. Then there is, in addition to the actual loss of blood, the never-ceasing irritation of the ticks and hence no rest for the animal. Its existence is beset by continuous torture.

ROTATION OF PASTURES.

A remedy possessing real merit for evading or mitigating the damage done by the tick has been found in the rotation of pastures. Owing to the fact that this tick can only live a certain length of time without food, it is possible to rid a pasture of the parasite by keeping all stock out of it for this length of time. This will, of course, necessitate a double set of pastures, so arranged that tick communication from one to another—or from the outside—is impossible. Water courses running through these pastures, and coming from tick-infected territory, may bring eggs and seed-ticks from a distance and reinfest them.

ERADICATION OF THE TICK.

What have these experiments in the rotation of pastures and feed lots determined? They have brought to light the most vital fact in the whole tick problem, viz, that the tick can be surely and easily destroyed in a manner entirely practical throughout the infested territory. The methods will probably not be exactly the same everywhere, owing to climatic and probably other differences. These conditions will have to be studied and thereafter methods adopted for each locality. We know, for instance, that one summer's starvation here, or complete exclusion of cattle from a pasture there during the winter months, will suffice to kill the ticks. If we are now so located that reinfection can not take place, then we have the tick problem solved, by simply starving the ticks out and be done with them forever, and from now on have "above quarantine" conditions. Should this freeing of the pastures from the ticks happen along the present quarantine line, as has been done in a number of counties in North Carolina, then the newly cleaned area will be admitted to the favored cattle-growing region "above the quarantine line." Should it occur deep within the quarantined territory, then the newly made tick-free land could be granted favor in its cattle industry by the Government not enjoyed by the ticky territory surrounding it. Of course this isolated piece of tick-free land would be protected by a strict quarantine against all neighbors, which would once more complicate trade relations. However, whatever methods of tick eradication may be found best suited to the different localities, the tick can be made to go, and will only remain a terror to southern cattle and a great handicap to southern agriculture by suffrage.

THE COST.

Below the quarantine line we have something over 15,000,000 cattle, the total farm value of which is given by the last census as nearly $183,000,000. The dairy cattle are credited with a value of about $58,650,000, and the other cattle with over $124,000,000. From observation and experience I estimate that a shrinkage in value of 20 per cent in cattle other than dairy cattle is due to the effects of the cattle tick, which, in round figures, would mean a direct annual loss of $25,000,000 for beef cattle. The dairy cattle, being better cared for and confined to a large extent in lots where the ticks can not flourish or even exist, suffer less damage. Nevertheless considerable damage is experienced in a great many instances, especially in the country, for extra feed required and in the shrinkage in the flow of milk in tick infestation. It is believed that an estimate of 5 per cent of the total value of the dairy cattle is not overcharging the cattle tick, which means an annual loss of nearly $3,000,000.

The total loss, then, of southern cattle on account of the tick, under these heads, would be $28,000,000.

But there is also chargeable to the tick a great number of deaths, either from acute Texas fever or acute depletion, or induced tuberculosis or kidney diseases, which deaths are often attributed to some other cause or are not understood at all. In the writer's opinion there is a further loss to be recorded against the infection of the tick in the reduction of fecundity in the female cattle, and also in the greater proness of tick-infested cattle to diseases on abnormal conditions of the reproductive organs, bringing about abortion. This loss is often severely felt, especially in herds of full-blood animals.

Then there is also chargeable to the tick the greater expense of providing pasturage for the cattle or extra feed during heavy infestation, for dips and other preventive measures, extra care and supervision. It is deemed a conservative estimate to place the annual loss under these three heads at 10 per cent of the actual value of all our cattle, or nearly $18,500,000. Then there is another very material charge to be entered against the tick. With tick infestation at babyhood, the only time when the animal may with a degree pass the ordeal, there is very little chance to ever bring cattle to early maturity. The stunting they usually receive obliges us to carry them until they are 3 or 4 years old. A baby-beef industry, with the cattle tick infesting our cattle, is not possible. Therefore instead of being able, like the farmers above the quarantine line, to market cattle when they are 24 to 30 months old, we have to carry ours two years longer. That means two years of extra feed and care and capital tied up unnecessarily by adverse conditions. It costs easily $5 per year to provide and care for a cow; and to keep our 12,000,000 beef cattle over one year would mean an extra outlay of $60,000,000 yearly, not mentioning the interest of the dead capital of some $125,000,000.

Then there is the loss caused by the special transportation and yard facilities that have to be provided, which will all finally come out of the pockets of the Southern cattle owners. There is the loss caused by interference with free and unmolested traffic and the lower price obtained at the markets on account of the necessary regulations. Then there is also the cost of the inspection service and the maintenance of the quarantine. It is very easily seen that the annual loss sustained by the Southern States to-day amounts yearly to the enormous sum of $150,000,000.

Let us look at this subject in still another light. The average value of southern cattle is $7 below the average value of northern cattle. In the State of Arkansas the beef cattle are given a value of $7.50 per head. Those of Iowa, also situated in the Mississippi Valley, are valued at $19.42, almost three times as much. It can be quite well imagined that if the southern cattle were not infected with this tick they would very soon produce cattle of average value equaling those of the Northern States. In other words, over 12,000,000 beef cattle would be worth $84,000,000 more than they are now. It is also easy to believe that the Southern States, with everything favorable to cattle growing, would soon double and even treble their number of cattle, if the tick were gone. The benefits that would accrue from this additional asset are denied us because of the tick.

Then who can estimate the benefit that would result from the increased fertility of the soil which would naturally result from a great cattle industry. Instead of exporting now to foreign countries over 820,000,000 pounds of cotton-seed meal, we could feed it to our cattle and thus keep the enormous amount of fertilizer, of which we now rob our farms, at home; and thereby secure the future of our agricultural greatness. If for no other object but to prevent exporting the fertility of our soil, to see our cotton seed fed to cattle on the farms where this seed is produced, any amount of money spent in the complete eradication of the cattle tick would be a bagatelle compared to the benefits derived. To speak of an annual loss of $100,000,000, chargeable in the aggregate to the cattle tick, does not nearly approach the true loss sustained by our country because of its presence. To eradicate the cattle tick from the Southern States means to preserve the Egypt of our hemisphere. It means the preservation of the supremacy of American agriculture.

In his circular, Dr. Tait Butler, State veterinarian of North Carolina, states:

Special attention is hereby called to the changes in the cattle quarantine lines in North Carolina to prevent the spread of tick fever. Those interested in the cattle industry and the removal of the most serious obstacle to its development, the fever tick, will note with satisfaction the increase in the free or unquarantined area of the State.

Fig. 1,[a] page 2, shows the Federal quarantine line as it was in 1902, while Fig. 2,[a] page 2, shows the line in force during 1906.

It will be noted that ten entire counties—Wilkes, Caldwell, Burke, Alexander, Iredell, Davie, Surry, Catawba, Lincoln, Gaston, and parts of two others, Rowan and McDowell—have been exempted from all Federal quarantine restrictions during the past four years. This is the result of a campaign of tick extermination which has been carried on by the North Carolina department of agriculture, and is certainly a gratifying success. It not only demonstrates the feasibility of exterminating the fever ticks in all "stock-law" sections, but the small cost at which the work has been done also proves that it is easy, practicable, and profitable. Those who have given such matters consideration know that an embargo on a free exchange of the products of any industry is the most serious obstacle to its development, and it is safe to state that the present undeveloped condition of the southern cattle industry is, to a very great extent, the result of the ravages of the fever tick and the attendant Federal quarantine restrictions. To reach the best markets our cattle must go north of the quarantine line, and must be slaughtered at once or go back home. The buyers know this and pay from one-fourth cent to one-half cent per pound less for them than for cattle of the same quality from north of the quarantine line.

The ten counties which have been released from all Federal quarantine restrictions, because we have exterminated the fever ticks within their borders, sell about $288,000 worth of cattle annually. If the price of these cattle was reduced only one-fourth of a cent per pound it meant an annual loss of one-twelfth of $288,000, or $24,000, which is double the entire amount expended in exterminating the ticks in those counties. In other words, any "stock-law" county in North Carolina now under quarantine can be freed from ticks, and as a result exempted from Federal quarantine restrictions, for less money than is now lost each year solely because of the presence of the ticks.

Briefly stated, the method of extermination found most applicable to our conditions is as follows: Inspectors are employed, who make a farm-to-farm canvass of the territory with a view to locating tick-infested farms, which are at once quarantined and the owners carefully instructed as to the importance and object of the work, and especially as to the easiest and best means of exterminating the ticks on their places. The means of killing the ticks found most practicable in this State is what is known as the "starvation method." All cattle, horses, and mules are taken out of the tick-infested pastures, lanes, and lots for one season—that is, a new pasture is provided; or all cattle, horses, and mules are taken out of the pastures, lanes, or lots to be cleared of ticks not later than September 1 and kept out until the following May.

Attention is also directed to Fig. 3,* page 4. The heavy dark line shows the State and Federal quarantine line across North Carolina which will be enforced during 1906. The dotted line shows a provisional quarantine line adopted by the State and Federal authorities for the purpose of preventing the reinfection of those counties lying between the two lines. It is in these counties that we are prosecuting the work of tick extermination, and it is evident this work can not be successful unless we prevent the introduction into them of ticks from farther south and east; hence the necessity of rigidly enforcing this provisional or second quarantine line. It should be further understood that this second quarantine line offers a double protection to those counties entirely free of ticks and above the Federal quarantine line; for to enter that territory tick-infested cattle must cross both lines and the whole of the intervening territory in which State inspectors are constantly at work.

GOOD ROADS.

The bill seeks to have appropriated for experiments looking to the betterment of our public highways $60,000. If it were for $60,000,000 for building good roads throughout the length and breadth of these United States, it would meet with my most hearty approval and earnest support. Nothing is more conducive to the material upbuilding of a country than good roads, and nothing more destructive to the financial welfare of the agricultural interests of the country than the miserable highways over which the agricultural products have to be transported. I regret that the ten minutes time limit allowed me does not permit of an elaborate and exhaustive discussion of this most important subject.

At some more opportune time I shall present this question for consideration, and trust to be able to demonstrate that the advantages to be derived by all classes from the construction of good roads will more than compensate for all the expense incident thereto.

At this time suffice it to say that the building of good roads will do more to bring the people together in fraternal relations, to promote their educational facilities and their religious zeal, to extend the trade and commerce of the country, and add more to their happiness than anything else.

The enormous amount of agricultural products of our country have to be transported over the public highways to get to the open markets of the world.

Good roads save money, time, labor, and annoyance. They are conducive to the social development of the people; enhance property values and increase the profits from agricultural products, as of all other commodities transported over them, begetting a spirit of contentment among the people, cementing them in a more compact union, and imbuing them with a spirit of patriotism, making them better citizens in time of peace and producing out of them heroes in the time of war. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in the time allotted to me the other day, in what I had to say about the rural free-delivery boxes, I did not have time to put in the RECORD the letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General referring to a proposed route mentioned by me at that time. I have asked for this time to read the letter and comment on it.

The letter is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, April 26, 1906.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Referring to your personal call at the Department on the 5th instant to present a letter from H. B. Wade, of Enville, Tenn., concerning route No. 2 from that office, you are advised that establishment of the route in question has been postponed on account of the failure of the patrons to provide for approved rural mail boxes. The postmaster was advised some time ago that of the 114 families reported by the rural agent as convenient for service on the route, three-fourths, or 80, would be required to pledge themselves "to provide for approved rural mail boxes." It appears that the patrons have construed this requirement to mean that eighty approved boxes must be erected. This is a misunderstanding on the part of the postmaster. Families to the number of five are permitted to use a single box, but rural carriers are not permitted to deliver mail outside of approved rural boxes.

A letter has been this day addressed to the postmaster at Enville, explaining the Department's requirement in this particular, and upon receipt of the necessary certificate the question of establishment will be given further consideration.

Very respectfully,
P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

This letter proves conclusively, as I said before, that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General is now administering his Department so as to make it mandatory that the patrons must buy and put up the box which he requires and approves before the route will be established. What could be more tyrannical? What could be more arbitrary? Has the Czar of Russia ever prescribed what his subjects shall buy for their private use? Has he ever prescribed that they shall buy government-approved property for private use, thereby creating a monopoly in favor of those who manufacture the property he approves? In the above letter he says five families may use the same box.

* Not printed.

What is the use of a box at all? What is the use of a private box? The idea has been held out to us that on account of the importance of protection to the mail put in those boxes, that they had been required to procure and put up such boxes as the Department approves, to the end that the protection of the mail of the private citizen in his private receptacle should be secured. But here he says that five families may use one box. On the route referred to in that letter, which is being held up, it is inconvenient for five families to use the box, as they live widely scattered along the route. But suppose they can and suppose they do so, what protection is afforded to their mail if five families use the same box with the possibility of endless confusion, with the possibility of the mail getting mixed and going astray, and with the prospect of these five families falling out and having neighborhood difficulties, mutually accusing each other of getting the wrong mail?

All that is possible; neighborhood troubles may easily grow out of this arbitrary, despotic, unreasonable, and foolish requirement. One would think that no officer of the Government would ever be guilty of such conduct unless he was required by statute to do so. All the scandals, or nearly all, that have existed in the Post-Office Department in the last few years have grown out of this question of furnishing supplies—mail boxes, painting mail boxes, fasteners, satchels, and straps—and yet here we find arbitrarily and without just excuse that a Department official prescribes that a private citizen shall buy and use from some other private interest a particular kind of property. Is it any wonder that people naturally suspect such conduct when there can be no reason for its enforcement except that the Post-Office Department may create a monopoly in favor of the men who make and sell these boxes at an unreasonable and unjust profit?

Ever since I have been in this House, in conversation with the proper officials of the Post-Office Department, and in discussing this matter with the members of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I have contended that patrons on rural routes should be permitted to put up and use such boxes as they saw fit, and that the requirement to use approved boxes was unjust and served no good purpose. While the Department continued to require the use of the approved boxes, it did not require it as a condition precedent to putting in the service. But now, not being satisfied with simply approving boxes and demanding that mail for patrons shall not be deposited in any other, it goes a step further and requires that the pledge to put up boxes to at least the number of 75 per cent of the families on the route to be served must be certified before the service will be established. The Department thus shows its hand, and boldly comes out on the side of its pets, the fortunate makers of boxes whose handiwork has thus been approved. The farmers of the country, who pay the taxes to support the Government and fight its battles, must be coerced to pay tribute to Mammon before a Department of the Government will permit them to be beneficiaries of a law of the land.

Requiring the use of approved boxes makes combination among the manufacturers thus favored easy and practical. Such approval is a highly valuable asset. The temptation to secure such approval by the use of corrupt means is great. It may be that the officials now in charge are so honest as to be above and beyond the power and influence of the grafter. I hope this is true. But why continue a practice that subjects them to suspicion? The patrons of rural routes do not want it. It is utterly useless, unjustly burdensome and expensive to the patrons. Then why continue it? There must be a controlling reason somewhere. There must be an interest to be served, and it is evident that it is not that of the patrons. Why this requirement should be continued by the Department until other scandals develop, until another Machen and another Beavers, the natural products of such environments, are discovered and exposed is to my mind incomprehensible.

To-day an ex-United States Senator, one who was a very noted member of that body, told me in the presence of several Members of this House that a gentleman had brought to him one of the best and cheapest rural mail boxes that he had ever seen, perfect in all its parts and cheap, and told him that the Department had refused to approve it, and wanted him to take the matter up for him. Now, why was this box not approved? Perhaps for what may have been to these officials, according to their standards, a good reason. Perhaps it did not weigh within 1 ounce of the expert conception of those who passed on it. Perhaps its parts were not so artistically proportioned as required by the æsthetic tastes of the red-tape brigade. Perhaps it was of durable material and would last too long. Perhaps it was offered too cheap and bore some evidence of having been made by "pauper labor." Perhaps it was made by "union labor." Of course it is all "perhaps," and we will never know just why this box spoken of by the former illustrious Senator was not approved.

Mr. Chairman, I say, Away with such tyranny! Down with such petty despotism! Let the best and most patriotic of our citizens, the landowners and soil tillers of this great country, say for themselves what character of boxes they desire for their private use, and let no red-tape official say nay.

Mr. Chairman, I have just commenced this fight, and I never intend to surrender until these rural-route patrons have a right to provide themselves in their own way with just such a receptacle as they want to use, and no subordinate Department official will ever prevent me from doing so. He may hold up every route in my district, he may discontinue every route in it, and I will continue to fight this miserable, arbitrary, unjust, unreasonable, and foolish ruling of the Post-Office Department as long as I am honored with a seat in this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate having expired, the Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13537—the agricultural appropriation bill—and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 4197. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to enter on the roll of Capt. Orlando Humason's Company B, First Oregon Mounted Volunteers, the name of Hezekiah Davis—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 2624. An act granting an honorable discharge to Henry G. Thomas, deceased, Company C, Second Kentucky Cavalry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1166. An act to correct the military record of Peleg T. Griffith—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 1211. An act to correct the military record of John Alspaugh—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 4718. An act granting an increase of pension to George W. Gilson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4569. An act granting an increase of pension to Augustus A. Nevins—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5668. An act granting an increase of pension to George P. Sealey—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5378. An act removing the charge of desertion from the name of William R. Garner—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 3164. An act to correct the military record of Patrick F. McDermott—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

S. 5702. An act granting an increase of pension to Anna C. Bingham—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5522. An act granting an increase of pension to Charles E. Sischo—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 1508. An act granting an increase of pension to James A. Murch—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5562. An act granting an increase of pension to John Hull—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3271. An act granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. Brown—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5680. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Bowser—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5754. An act granting a pension to Hannah McCarty—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5532. An act granting an increase of pension to Simon A. Snyder—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5735. An act granting an increase of pension to Andrew Danley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4488. An act granting an increase of pension to J. F. Amis—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 5736. An act granting an increase of pension to Mary Clark—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 557. An act granting an increase of pension to Mariot Losure—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 678. An act granting an increase of pension to Albert Butler—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 2467. An act granting an increase of pension to Martin Clark—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5163. An act granting an increase of pension to John Marah—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 3483. An act granting an increase of pension to William L. Sheaff—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4358. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas McCormick—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4005. An act granting an increase of pension to Michael Quill.

S. 5082. An act granting an increase of pension to David N. Winsell—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4361. An act granting an increase of pension to John W. Daley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5523. An act granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Pickett—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5349. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. H. Robinson—to the Committee on Pensions.

S. 4460. An act granting an increase of pension to Ann J. Thompson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 5247. An act granting an increase of pension to Jacob Wigel—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

S. 4457. An act granting an increase of pension to L. A. Tyson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, April 29, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by its Chief Clerk, Mr. WILLIAM J. BROWNING, who stated that the Speaker had designated Hon. JAMES L. SLAYDEN, a Representative from the State of Texas, to act as Speaker pro tempore for this day.

Mr. SLAYDEN took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal and ever-living God, our heavenly Father, out of the deeps we cry unto Thee, "Our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble." We thank Thee for the spirit which brings us together here to-day, a spirit of profound regard and affection for one who, for a short time, became a Member of the Congressional family and left behind him a sweet and tender memory in the minds and hearts of those who knew him.

His was a life of struggle, a noble effort to high ideals. Seizing every opportunity he sought to bring out the highest and best in his nature, sacrificing in childhood and youth to obtain an education. A soldier, fighting for what he conceived to be right, meeting defeat with that splendid courage which was a part of his being, he laid down his arms and strove to fit himself for the new conditions that he might be of use as a public servant, and reaching a position of which any man may justly be proud. He died beloved and honored by a host of friends. We mourn his loss and mingle our tears with his dear ones. Comfort them, we beseech Thee, O heavenly Father, with the blessed hope of the Christian religion, and may his life be an incentive to all who knew him to strive after the best. And honor and praise be Thine through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 28, was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE PINCKNEY.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. JOHN M. PINCKNEY, late a Member of this House from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That as a special mark of respect and honor to the memory of the deceased and in due recognition of his distinguished career as a citizen of his State and as a Member of this House, that the House, at the conclusion of the exercises of this day, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members of the House have leave for thirty days to print memorial addresses upon the life, character, and distinguished services of the late Representative PINCKNEY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that Members desiring to do so have leave for thirty days to print remarks on the life, character, and distinguished services of the late Representative PINCKNEY. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, it is with profound sorrow that I offer this poor tribute to the memory of a departed friend, my immediate predecessor in this honorable body, JOHN M. PINCKNEY, whose tragic death occurred at his home town, Hempstead, Tex., on the night of April 24, 1905. The Congressional Directory of the Fifty-eighth Congress contains the following brief sketch of our deceased friend's life:

JOHN MCPHERSON PINCKNEY, Democrat, of Hempstead, was born in Grimes County, Tex., May 4, 1845, and was reared near the place of his birth; the only education he received was in the public schools near the place of his birth and what he has secured by his own study; was a Confederate soldier, serving four years in the Fourth Texas Regiment, Hood's brigade; entered upon the practice of law in 1875; served ten years as district attorney of the twenty-third judicial district of Texas and three years as county judge of Waller County; was elected to the Fifty-eighth Congress November 17, 1903, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hon. Thomas H. Ball.

That his services were satisfactory and his efforts were appreciated by the people of his district is evidenced by the fact that he was reelected to the Fifty-ninth Congress.

Living in an adjoining county to his home, and in one of the counties composing the twenty-third judicial district of Texas at the time he was attorney for such district, it was my privilege to know Judge PINCKNEY intimately for fifteen years. A strong advocate of law and order, he was a terror to the law-breaker, always doing his whole duty, prosecuting the influential citizen with the same earnestness and vigor with which he prosecuted the friendless criminal. He was a stranger to fear, and I have often heard many of his old comrades praise his services as a soldier. One incident that I remember having heard related by one of his comrades, now a prominent citizen of my home county, which fairly illustrated the determined character of the man, was that during a certain battle he received a severe wound in the head, was carried to the rear, his wound dressed, and in less than an hour he was again in the front ranks in the thickest of the battle.

The short time that he was a Member of this body probably did not give his colleagues the opportunity to know him as it was my privilege and pleasure. He was faithful to every trust, modest and unassuming, but courageous and determined. He was a true and loyal friend, devoted to his brothers and to his maiden sister, who shared his home. That sister and one brother survive him. Their loss is irreparable; and in his death his country has sustained the loss of a faithful and honest servant, and Texas, his native State, a noble, loyal, and devoted son.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, about one year ago, in this beautiful month, when the earth was covered with its mantle of green and the genial sunshine had coaxed from their hiding the myriads of flowers on the prairies of Texas, JOHN M. PINCKNEY, a Member of this House, at a public assembly of his own people, in his own loved town, fell under the deadly fire of passionate and misguided men. He was pierced by many bullets from behind, "and died so instantly that he passed without pain from the service of his country to the service of his God," and "from the rounds of fame's ladder he stepped to the sky."

Those about him tell me that in the last moments of his life he was advocating a cause which he believed to be right and was contending for the supremacy and enforcement of the law for which he always stood; and though unarmed and under deadly fire, he exhibited that superb courage which had distinguished him on so many fields of battle. His tragic death was a shock to the people of Texas, and especially did the women mourn, for he boldly championed the cause of temperance, so dear to them.

The time of his service in this House was short, and, being unfamiliar with the rules of procedure that govern here, he took no part in debate upon the floor, but each day found him in his place voting intelligently and honestly on all questions thus determined. His manner was so quiet and reserved, his modesty was such that, in this brilliant, ambitious, pushing throng of men, he was scarcely observed, and outside of his own State delegation was known by only a few Members of this House; and yet had the record of his life been known to you, and could you have looked through the window of his soul and seen the man behind the garb, all who love the brave, the true, and the unselfish ones in life would have drawn close to him and hailed him as a brother. He moved in that quiet, unobtrusive rank where each day's duty is well performed, and where in the great emergencies of life heroes and leaders are found. I knew him well; he was my friend and comrade. And "it is not fit that such a man should pass unheralded to the tomb; it is not fit that such a life should steal unnoticed to its close;" but if my old friend was living now, or if, from beyond the stars, he still has knowledge of the affairs of men, he would not have me add one thing to the record he has made, use one flattering word, or magnify his virtues by too partial praise.

JOHN PINCKNEY belonged to the distinguished family of that name of South Carolina, from which State his father moved with his family to Texas before the civil war. His mother died when he was about 16 years of age, his father was a cripple and an invalid, and JOHN was the main support of his father, two sisters, and a little brother. Extreme poverty deprived him of early educational advantages, and it seemed would forever shut the door of opportunity in his face.

Unaided he bore his loving burden cheerfully and well, and by his own efforts, supported by his sister's, raised and educated orphan children. He secured a fair education, studied law, and took good rank at the bar. He was elected district attorney for ten consecutive years in his district without opposition, and was recognized as one of the ablest, most fearless, and successful prosecuting attorneys in Texas, and perhaps no one in that State had ever prosecuted to conviction in so many cases of homicide. He was elected without opposition as county judge of his county, then elected to Congress, though opposed for the nomination by some of the ablest lawyers in south Texas. His success in public life was largely due to his splendid character, devotion to duty, and honesty and integrity, and close sympathy with the masses of the people.

Mr. PINCKNEY was never neutral; every question of public interest was to him either right or wrong. If right, he conceived it to be his duty to uphold it; if wrong, to publicly condemn, and whatever position he assumed he made no concessions, was influenced by no policy, and deterred by no danger. He preserved to the end of his life a character which never knew a stain and a courage which never surrendered a principle.

He was never married; he supported his sister and orphan children; he lived for others and never thought of self. He had but little of this world's goods. He earned no money by sharp practice or by overreaching his fellow-men, and whatever he earned by honest toil he had no coffers wherein to place it. For those dependent upon him he provided well according to his means, and all the rest, with generous heart and open hands, he gave in charity to the needy and the poor.

At the outbreak of the civil war PINCKNEY, then a boy 16 years of age, enlisted as a private soldier in the Fourth Texas Regiment of Hood's immortal brigade, and in that four years of unequal contest, where might at last prevailed, this boy in gray became a hero—not such an one as a partial press makes for acts of little valor, but in that great struggle where gray and blue alike did noble deeds. He received his baptism of fire at Elthams Landing, and at Gaines Mill he and the boys of his command, by their valor, placed the general's wreath around the colonel's stars of John B. Hood. He was at Second Manassas. He was at Sharpsburg, or Antietam, in the cornfield, where the rank growth was mown by the sickles of battle, and where more than half of his comrades were left dead and wounded on the field. He was at the Wilderness, and saw Captain Harding, of his command, lead the great commander's horse back to the rear from the line of certain death, and he fell wounded on the field just as the shout of victory was raised. He came with Longstreet and Hood to Chickamauga, where the veterans of the Army of Northern Virginia touched elbows on the firing line with the veterans of the Tennessee, and, united, contended on that bloody field with men of equal valor who wore the blue. He was at the storming of Round Top Mountain at Gettysburg, where human valor reached its highest flood tide, and where, could the crest of the mountain have been held for a few brief moments, the Confederacy would have lived and the history of the world been changed. He was in every great battle of the Army of Northern Virginia, except the first Manassas and Fredericksburg, and was one of the 8,000 immortals in gray who laid down their muskets at Appomattox. He was a private infantry soldier from the beginning to the end of the war, but the heroes of war are not always on horseback, nor do they always bear the insignia of rank, but more often are the man who bears the battle flag and the color guard who around him stand to raise it when he falls, and there is where JOHN PINCKNEY often stood. When the cause for which he contended was lost and his country's flag was forever furled in gloom and in glory, PINCKNEY in good faith accepted his parole from a brave and generous foe, which from that time he honestly observed. He turned his face to the South, and, though worn by war and enfeebled by wounds, he tramped 2,000 miles to his loved Texas home.

He stood with other returned Confederates through all the dark days of reconstruction, days more trying than war, more humiliating than defeat, but never losing hope, and he and those like him redeemed the Southland from radical misrule and placed it in the way of progress, and to them is due its present wonderful prosperity. In war and in peace he bore himself so well that the people loved and trusted and greatly honored him; and the uneducated country boy in gray who forty years before with rifle in hand stood picket on the banks of the Potomac, with scant clothing to shield him from the winter's blast, returned a Representative in the Congress of this great, happy, and reunited country.

Mr. Speaker, I witnessed once, in this splendid Capitol, the honors paid to one who died high in place and power. Grand and imposing were the obsequies. The great ones of the nation and those who represent the nations of the earth were here, and many thousands came to pay deserved honor to the distinguished dead. In the Senate Chamber the coffin rested on a bed of roses and the pomp and ceremony was befitting the grand and solemn occasion, and it was well, for a great man was dead and the nation mourned. But all this did not so impress me as did the simple services on the occasion of PINCKNEY'S death. When I reached there the old soldier lay at rest in his little humble, vineclad home; a brother, who gave his life in his defense, lay dead beside him, and his dear old sister—sister and mother both to him—could not be comforted, for death had sent too many darts of late into her devoted heart. The excitement of the day was over, the passions of men had subsided, the day was as beautiful and quiet as was the first Sabbath at creation's dawn, the funeral bell tolled slowly as if each stroke would be the last, and as though reluctant to bear the sad, sad tidings.

It was the warm springtime and the air was laden with the perfume of the jasmine and the rose. The people came by thousands from miles around—the rich and poor—in buggies, wagons, on horseback, and on foot. A few old soldiers, the remnant of his gallant command, who had placed many of his fallen comrades in shallow trenches on the battlefield, stood by to bear him to his final resting place. An earnest, simple prayer was said, tears were falling, and many heart sobs could be heard. The hearse moved out and all the people followed in slow and long procession far across the prairie to the little country churchyard. Loving hands placed the clods above him, an humble prayer was said while the people knelt, a brief tribute was spoken, and then the women banked high the roses and prairie flowers on his lonely grave. I thought this is indeed the tribute my plain old friend would like, and such as his brave, useful, and unselfish life so well deserved, and looking at his quiet, peaceful resting place and thinking of the struggles he had had in life, the battles fought, the dangers past, the victories won, the many wounds upon his weary body, his comrades gone before, that could he have spoken he would have said:

Dear friends, what the women lave
For the last sleep of the grave,
Is a hut which I am quitting,
Is a garment no more fitting,
Is a cage from which, at last,
Like a bird, my soul has passed.

Love the inmate, not the room,
The wearer, not the garb,
The plume of the eagle, not the bars
That hold me from those splendid stars.

I cast a clod upon his lonely grave, have paid a last poor, but loving tribute to his memory, and now, my old friend and comrade, for a time, farewell and good cheer to you and all the boys, I'll meet you on the river at the crossing in the morning when the reveille shall sound.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of this opportunity to endeavor to pay a merited tribute of respect to the memory of a departed associate. I wish, sir, that I were able to pay a tribute commensurate with his deserts, but poverty of language denies to me that privilege.

I did not know Mr. PINCKNEY before our association here. I did learn here to know him well. He was a retiring, modest, unassuming gentleman. Ofttimes during the sessions of the House he would meet me and talk in that quiet, friendly, comforting way that drew us close together. He was not the dazzling sunflower nor the gorgeous rose; he was not one who startled or commanded men; but he was more like the violet, modest and retiring, that we have to search for, but that when found we gather to ourselves to be admired and loved.

As a boy Mr. PINCKNEY had not the advantages of wealth or of influential station, but as the son of an invalid father, was cast upon his own efforts and resources and had to bear much of the burden of the support of his family. He met the duties and responsibilities of a noble son in a way befitting the nobility of his character and his purpose. Growing into manhood, entering into the estate of citizenship, he ever met and discharged the duties and responsibilities that came to him in a way that won for him the esteem, the confidence, and the respect of his fellow-citizens. Early in his life came that trying epoch in our nation's history when, as he saw his duty, it became incumbent upon him to enter upon the field of battle and assume the obligations of a soldier. Those who knew him during those times have testified to-day and others will testify to the splendid life and character and to the unsullied bravery which he displayed on the field of battle.

He came out of the war in the very prime of young manhood and began to enter upon the duties of citizenship. He had so won the respect and confidence of his people that they honored him, as has been told you, by election to the judgeship for a series of years to preserve the order and maintain the Government among his people. He was also elected, for a longer number of years, as prosecuting attorney, to conduct the active administration of the duty of prosecuting offenders against the law and dignity of his State. In both of these positions, with unflinching courage, with unwavering devotion, with an impartiality which commended him for more exalted station, he honored himself and he honored his people, and they commissioned him to represent them in this august body. When he came here he brought with him the same devotion to duty, the same purity of purpose, which had characterized his life and his public service at home.

Mr. Speaker, JOHN M. PINCKNEY was an honorable man. When I say that I do not limit him to that narrow view of honesty which renders to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. I do not place him upon the low level of the motto attributed to Benjamin Franklin, that "honesty is the best policy." It is true, sir, that honesty is the best policy; but may we not stop for a moment to think upon what a low plane that places this virtue—to be honest because it is politic, to be honest because it may be profitable, to be honest because it may serve a purpose or promote a selfish interest? Nay, verily, Mr. Speaker, JOHN M. PINCKNEY was an honorable man who rose into the higher clime of integrity of character and nobility of purpose. He was honest because he loved the truth. He was honorable because falsehood was hateful to his soul. He was honorable because the truth was congenial to his very being. JOHN M. PINCKNEY, Mr. Speaker, was a good man. As I intimated a moment ago, I would not say that he was a great man. He was not one of those whose brilliance and genius shone out as an overpowering light. We often impress upon others and upon our children the truth that it is a good thing to be a great man. I commend it, and it is true. But let us turn that proposition around, and it is equally true that it is a great thing to be a good man.

JOHN M. PINCKNEY was a good man, and in the superlative character of his goodness he was great. Mr. PINCKNEY was a man of convictions. He believed something. What he declared he believed, and he declared what he believed. He was not afraid for the world to know his purpose; he did not desire to withhold from his fellows his belief and his convictions. One thing he believed that I may properly refer to here, Mr. Speaker, and that is, he believed in temperance. He believed in private and public sobriety. He believed that it was to the uplifting of his fellow-men and to the betterment of his Commonwealth to have sober citizens, and to that conviction he gave his life; and no grander tribute can be paid to his memory, no better testimony can be borne to his character, than the solemn fact that he gave his life for the betterment of his people in upholding that principle of individual and public sobriety which he believed was a foundation principle in human society. It was a holy moment, a noble cause in which to die. Mr. Speaker, we can not understand the mystery of death—why it is that he should have been cut down just at that moment, or why others go in such mysterious and, as it seems to us, inopportune times. It is not my purpose here to philosophize about death, but one thought does occur to me. The seed must be planted to grow. As long as it remains unplanted it is circumscribed and limited by its own circumference; but plant the seed in the soil, in the sunshine and rain, and the body breaks and there comes forth the plant with its foliage, its fruitage, and its flowers; and so it has been said of us: Except we be planted we shall not live; earth to earth, dust to dust; the manacles of the flesh broken loose, the limitation of the senses removed, and the soul in communion with the universe, in fellowship with eternity. In that life, Mr. Speaker, where the good and the true and the brave are gathered, there we shall expect to find JOHN M. PINCKNEY, and to be with the true, the good, and the brave of the earth forever will be satisfaction.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, one year and five days have elapsed since Hon. JOHN M. PINCKNEY, in a deplorable tragedy, at the town of Hempstead, Tex., in an unexpected moment, was hurled into eternity. His death came without warning while he was attending a citizens' meeting of his home town. It grew out of one of those unfortunate differences so frequently engendered by a discussion of the liquor problem. JOHN M. PINCKNEY sprang from a talented and chivalrous race of men who have made the history of more than one Southern State rich in deeds of valor and patriotism. His name is linked with those of the Prestons, Sims, Bees, and others of the South who have contributed to the glory and achievement of this Republic.

In the early days of this Government, while Washington and Adams were President, there were complications of our commerce on the high seas with France, and citizens of that country were committing depredations against us. Adams sent an embassy to France to adjust the differences between the two nations. The French Directory insulted our embassy by refusing to give audience until a liberal sum was paid the French Government and a quarter of a million dollars was given to Talleyrand, who was on the Directory. In reply to this disgraceful demand, one of our embassy made the immortal answer: "Millions for defense, but not one cent for tribute." Thus answered Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, a citizen of South Carolina. From this patriotic name and distinguished ancestry sprang JOHN M. PINCKNEY. He ever proved himself a worthy son of the noble race of men preceding him. Their ardent patriotism and conscientious regard for right never abated in the slightest degree in the brain and heart of the latter-day Pinckneys.

In the life of our deceased brother may be gleaned many lessons worthy to be emulated by the youth of the land. Through his whole career, public and private, the noblest and best impulses of humanity were ever present and predominant. The good ran through his whole existence. Evil never found lodgment in his make-up. The history of this man is worthy to be held up before all mankind. It is deserving the best study and the deepest scrutiny of everyone.

Let me briefly portray his career. He was a native Texan, born in Grimes County in May, 1845. When the war between the States came on in 1861, a beardless youth, he enlisted under the flag of the Confederacy. He joined Company G, Fourth Texas Regiment Volunteer Infantry, organized at Camp Texas, near Richmond, Va., in September, 1861, under Col. John B. Hood. He participated in all the battles of his regiment (except Fredericksburg) from the first, in the woods at Eltham Landing on the Virginia peninsula, through the campaigns in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Georgia, Tennessee, and Virginia again, until the immortal Robert E. Lee surrendered at Appomattox. Among the notable battles of his career were the great struggles at Gaines Mill, Second Manassas, Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, and the Wilderness. Once captured, he remained a prisoner only fifteen days. Thrice wounded, once seriously, he languished on the battlefield of the Wilderness for two days. His wounded Texas comrades stricken down by his side on that fateful day have testified to his soldierly bearing through that terrible ordeal. Rising from the blood-stained and cruel battle ground a veteran of many conflicts, though not yet 20 years of age, he emerged from that terrific struggle and returned to his home and native State. As soon as he could gather means and get himself in readiness, he took up the study of law, and in 1875 was admitted to the bar. Locating at Hempstead, the place where rest his mortal remains, he was elected district attorney, and for ten years, without opposition, held this responsible office, achieving most signal distinction as a prosecutor, so fair, honorable, vigilant, efficient, and courageous was his administration in office. In 1900, without opposition, he was chosen county judge of his county and filled that place with great credit until 1903, when he was elected to the United States Congress to fill out the unexpired term of the Hon. Thomas H. Ball, of Houston, Tex.

It is but fair and appropriate in giving a brief history of this splendid man, without reference to who was right or wrong, to set down a short allusion to the causes leading to his untimely death. It is truly lamentable that the question of local option in his county had wrought good men up to fever heat and arrayed friends and neighbors in warring and opposing factions. In his races for Congress his friends importuned him and said: "John, give up prohibition or you will not win the Congressional race." So zealously imbued with the righteousness of his cause he promptly replied: "I will never go back on women and children for Congressman or any other office!" Passions of men rose to the highest pitch, the citizens' meeting at Hempstead came, and in its midst, in the twinkling of an eye, the unsullied and knightly spirit of JOHN M. PINCKNEY was hushed forever. Without warning, without a murmur, his dauntless soul left his body while he calmly remarked: "They have killed me." A martyr to the cause he advocated and loved with all the intensity of his brave heart.

Men slay the prophets; fagot, rack, and cross
Make up the groaning record of the past;
But evil's triumphs are her endless loss,
And sovereign beauty wins the soul at last.

No power can die that ever wrought for truth;
Thereby a law of nature it became,
And lives unwithered in its sinewy youth,
When he who called it forth is but a name.

To-day we pay tribute to a man noble in every sense of the word. A brave soldier in Hood's superb and immortal Texas brigade; a prosecuting officer of the highest and most efficient order for ten years: an upright judge of the county where he now lies buried among those who knew and loved him best. With a stainless record he put aside the judicial ermine for higher honors. The youth of Texas could not well find a better prototype revealing all the elements of true manhood in a greater degree than the late JOHN M. PINCKNEY. He was never married, but lived with his brothers and the devoted sister, Sue M. Pinckney. The story of his life would not be complete without a reference to the love between this sister and brother. Their heartstrings were entwined with one another in the most tender devotion ever witnessed by men and women.

In all my experience and reading of history, fiction, romance, and poetry I have never met such complete love between sister and brother. This good man, who, in his youth, as a mere boy, had cared for a crippled father and his brothers with an affection that can not be portrayed by language, had made this sister the very heart of his desires, his hopes, his love. This guardian angel of his existence was the cynosure of every aspiration and every effort.

From her own language I know that for all the years of his life, after he became a man, he was never away from her a single day without sending to her through the mails some message of tenderness and cheer. Each day he wrote her a letter filled with affection and brotherly solicitude. What devotion from brother to sister! To know the life and love of this family thrills the heart and moves to tears, but when the tears are gone it makes us better for the exalted lessons that have been indelibly written in our innermost souls. Let me recite, substantially as another has given it, a brief incident illustrating the attachment between our deceased brother and this devoted sister. He worshiped at the shrine of his sister. The affection between Miss Sue Pinckney and JOHN M. PINCKNEY was most extraordinary. Miss Pinckney is a writer of no mean ability, having been a contributor, on more than one occasion, to the local press. She is the author of Douglas, Tender and True, a story of life before and during the civil war, which has been published in book form, and another book just printed, A Tale of the South. She is a Christian who says "Our Father which art in Heaven" reverently, confidingly, and sincerely. She has no more doubt of her faith than of the sun.

The night that JOHN M. PINCKNEY was nominated for Congress in Houston he boarded the first train for home. The news had already been telegraphed ahead, and the town was lurid with bonfires. A band was at the depot to meet him, and when the familiar form of the nominee descended the steps the air was rent with shouts. He did not heed them, however, for he saw advancing toward him the familiar form of one who had been for years his comforter and companion. It was the form of his sister. Though her figure was bent with the weight of years, and her face was not, in the common acceptance of the word, beautiful, it was lighted with the love of one whom she knew was happy on achieving the ambition of a lifetime. She was not attired in the latest Parisian garb, but on her head rested a plain white sunbonnet. To JOHN PINCKNEY, however, the face was radiantly beautiful, and when they met he grasped her in his arms and showered kisses upon her brow. It was the happiest moment of his lifetime, and the onlookers stood back and deeply impressive silence reigned over the crowd that a few moments before had been tumultuously applauding. More than one eye was wet with tears of sympathetic joy. He once said:

I owe more to my sister than can ever be expressed, and the ambition of my life is to so live that I will be worthy of her affection.

In 1903 he came to Congress as the Representative of the Eighth Congressional district. His service here was brief, but was characterized by the strictest fidelity to official duty. He was at all times a Democrat of the purest and best type. He honored his constituency, Texas, and his party on all occasions.

It can be truly said that JOHN PINCKNEY never faltered at the discharge of public or private obligation. He knew not fear, physical or moral. I pronounce no empty declaration when saying he hated wrong and loved all righteous things. With an honorable and distinguished life's work ended, he has gone to that—

Mysterious world, untraveled by the sun,
Where Time's far-wandering tide has never run.

In far-off Texas, 'neath a billowy blue sea of April flowers, he sleeps in the congenial soil of his native State. Texans knew, honored, and loved him. His memory will not soon be forgotten by her generous people. In one sphere alone did I know him best. He was my friend and here he proved himself—

Constant as the northern star,
Of whose true-fixed and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament.

The life of JOHN PINCKNEY was filled with those things that live after men to bless them. He will not be lost in the oblivion of forgetfulness. Neighbors, friends, Texans will cling tenaciously to his memory. Those grizzled veterans yet living who faced death on a hundred fields of carnage will glory in his career, which shed luster on their joint deeds of valor and patriotism.

Valiant soul, farewell!
And though the warrior's sun has set,
Its light shall linger round us yet,
Bright, radiant, blest.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, it is but fitting that we, Members of this body, which deals so much with the statistics of material prosperity and the worth and value of material products, should pause occasionally and devote some of our time, thought, and energy to a consideration of the material of which men are made; that we now and then should turn from glorifying partisan policies and political deeds to the exaltation of the deeds of men; that we occasionally should turn from the prose of life to its poetry.

This is why to-day, in pursuance of a custom handed down to us from the beginning, has been set aside to pay tribute to the memory and virtues of our friend who has passed over the river and now rests under the shade of the trees.

In the Fifty-eighth Congress there came to us one whom, though he stayed with us but a short time, all of us who knew him learned to love. This one, Mr. Speaker, was JOHN M. PINCKNEY of Texas.

The history of this man's active participation in the affairs of his country may be divided into two clearly separate and distinct periods or epochs, in each of which he builded for himself a monument more lasting than brass, the period of boyhood, for it was as a boy he fought the battles of his country and inscribed his name upon the imperishable records of valor as the bravest of the brave; the period of manhood, for in this he battled with the adversities of destroyed fortune and an oppressed and desolated land and inscribed his name upon the records of those trying times as the truest of the true.

JOHN M. PINCKNEY sprang from a long line of illustrious ancestors. He was a scion of the Pinckney stock who, in Colonial times and for the first third of the nineteenth century, dominated the political activities and governmental agencies of the States of Maryland and South Carolina.

After serious financial reverses in 1837 his father settled in Texas. Here in Grimes County JOHN M. PINCKNEY was born on the 5th day of May, 1845.

While a boy in his teens the tocsin of war sounded. His country summoned, he answered her summons and gave to her all his boyhood and young manhood. He enlisted on the 20th day of April, 1861, in Company G, Fourth Texas Infantry, then commanded by Col. John B. Hood. Immediately he left his home and saw it no more until the cause for which he fought was lost, his government overthrown, and his president a shackled prisoner in the chilly, gloomy casement at Fortress Monroe. He was a famous member of the famous Hood's Texas Brigade. This brigade, it is the sober truth to say, was the best body of infantry that ever mustered on this globe. Xenophon has told of the advance and retreat of the 10,000 Greeks; no poet has sung, no historian has chronicled, the achievements of Hood's Texas Brigade.

When JOHN M. PINCKNEY and his brave companions in arms started on the long and toilsome journey from Houston, Tex., to Richmond, Va., they compassed in their march twice the distance of Xenophon and his 10,000 Greeks. To their infinite chagrin they reached Richmond the day after the first battle of Manassas was fought. They were then incorporated into the army of northern Virginia and were the star brigade of that illustrious army.

What the Macedonian phalanx was to Alexander, the Tenth Legion to Cæsar, the Ironsides to Cromwell, the Old Guard to Napoleon, Hood's Texas Brigade was to General Lee.

In the most desperate charge of the civil war—of any war—that at Gaines Mill, in July, 1862, this brigade, under the immediate command of Gen. John B. Hood, and under the eyes of their great commander, Lee, stormed three lines of bristling intrenchments, captured twenty-two pieces of artillery, and drove Sykes's division of regulars and Porter's whole corps in confusion from the field of battle. The gallant Hood, at the head of his victorious troops, was the first who leaped over the intrenchments; he turned, and there by his side stood the modest, brave, heroic JOHN M. PINCKNEY.

He was, with his stout-hearted brothers in arms, in the second Manassas, at Sharpsburg, and Suffolk.

When Longstreet's corps reached the fatal field of Gettysburg, in the early morning of the 2d day of July, 1863, JOHN M. PINCKNEY and five others of his regiment were sent out on a scout to ascertain the enemies line, position, and designs. Secretly, cautiously, and successfully they passed around the flank of the Federal Army, ascended the summits of Little and Big Round Top, and there beneath them, saw all the trains of the Union Army, its artillery, and thousands of its troops huddled together, not suspecting that the enemy was so near. The brave PINCKNEY immediately dispatched two of his scouts to General Hood with the information that they were on the flank of General Meade's army, and that that army, and all its trains and artillery, by bold and resolute attack, could be made the easy prize of General Lee, and urged that these positions be at once occupied by all the forces possible. When the messenger, with this information, reached General Hood he was just forming his division for an assault on Peach Orchard. He begged General Longstreet for permission to make the movement suggested by PINCKNEY, but Longstreet could not grant it, as General Lee had given him imperative orders to charge with his corps up the Emmitsburg Pike. Could this movement have been made, the result of the fearful struggle might have been different.

When General Lee's broken legions retreated from their murderous and hopeless assault on Cemetery Hill back to Virginia, JOHN M. PINCKNEY was ever with his command, at the point of danger, and when his division was hurried off to Chickamauga he went along, and under their veteran commanders, Longstreet and Hood, this division, with PINCKNEY in the front rank, stormed Snodgrass Hill, and drove the enemy in confusion from the bloody field.

At Knoxville, Bull's Gap, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House, Cold Harbor, and at 100 battles and skirmishes around Richmond and Petersburg JOHN M. PINCKNEY was always in the van, and bore a hero's part. But amid all these scenes of carnage and death the Supreme Arbiter of life and death suffered him not to be seriously harmed, but spared him, that he might become a factor in the material and social upbuilding of his beloved Southland, to whose cause he had devoted his boyhood and the flower of his young manhood.

Forty-one years ago from the 8th day of this month he stood in the last line of battle of the Army of Northern Virginia, at Appomattox. On the following day he stacked his arms, and with streaming eyes and heavy heart took up his melancholy march to his far-distant home in Texas.

While in war his character was grand, yet in the arts of peace, in his efforts for the enforcement of law and order, in his devotion to duty, in his fidelity to his friends, and in his ardent affection for his loved ones his character was sublime.

Though brave in war, he was heroic in peace. Though he devoted, in war, four years of his life in an effort to uphold the sovereignty of his State, he spent the remainder of his life in an effort to uphold the dignity and sanctity of her laws. In war he was a terror to honorable foes, in peace he was a terror to evildoers, and a shield to righteousness and virtue, and a protector of the innocent.

The same courage and the same fortitude, heightened in degree by his added years, he carried into civil life. He studied law by torchlight, and was admitted to the bar in 1875. In 1890 he was appointed district attorney of his district by Governor Ross, and for ten years faithfully and efficiently prosecuted all violators of the law. None were high enough or rich enough to secure immunity from just prosecution and punishment, and none low enough or poor enough to be subjected to unjust prosecution or punishment.

If I were asked what were the strongest traits of his character, I would say the honesty with which he formed his conclusions and the courage displayed in maintaining his convictions. He won the sobriquet of "Honest John." Time will not permit me to mention more than one illustration of this courage of conviction. Prior to his becoming a candidate for Congress he had been a Prohibitionist—that is, he favored the adoption by his community of the local laws provided by the State of Texas to prohibit the open saloon. These laws were very unpopular in certain parts of his district, and certain friends wrote him: "John, let prohibition alone, or you are beat for Congress." This manly reply was sent: "I will not go back on my convictions for Congress or any other office." Like the great Clay, he had rather be right, as he saw it, than be President. This won the respect and admiration of the most bitter opponents of his views on this subject, for all of us admire a man who fearlessly stands for his convictions, regardless of whether we agree with or differ from these convictions.

If I were asked what was the crowning trait of his character I would say his heaven-born devotion for those bound to him by ties of blood and family—his loved ones. While his love for his brothers was such that he would have given his life for them, the chords of his tenderest and sweetest affection naturally twined about his only sister.

These two, the brother and sister, were all love and devotion; they grew up together, and shared each other's every joy and sorrow. To her he was an idol; to him she was a solace and inspiration and incentive to lofty ideals and deeds.

He has been taken and now she is left. My heart goes out to her in her desolation. Alone, with no companion save the memory of his glorious life—alone to nurse that agony of grief which only a devoted heart like hers can feel, until she receives the summons to join again her loved ones upon the shore of that great beyond.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, JOHN MCPHERSON PINCKNEY is dead, and his colleagues and friends meet here to-day to pay our last tribute of respect to his memory. He died a sudden and a tragic death, the circumstances and manner of which furnish but another of which history is full of those striking, bitter commentaries upon the frailty of mankind. That human beings should become aroused by reason of religious or political differences to the height of passion and prejudice and to engage in the destruction of each other seems in our peaceful moments in a Christian age incomprehensible, and that is exactly what did occur—a sad picture which furnishes for us food for the profoundest reflection. The victim in this case was a man of notable characteristics. Other colleagues have spoken already of his matchless career as a soldier, of his devotion to civic duty. Certain it is that a review of this man's career as a soldier in Hood's Texas brigade stirs human hearts, and is a matter in which not only every Texan, not only every son of the South, not only every American, but every brave man can rejoice.

For many years Mr. PINCKNEY represented a judicial district, many counties of which were a part of the Congressional district in which I was first elected. We had very many warm mutual personal friends, and while I had known him for many years more or less intimately it was but natural that when he came to Congress we became at once intimate, warm personal friends. I wish to speak, out of my friendship for him and knowledge of his personal characteristics, of some of the elements of his character, all of which will be abundantly confirmed by what has been said of both his public and his private career. He came of an illustrious family, and while his environment as a young man was not equal to many more favored men in this life, it developed the fact that to be a fine character, to be a genuine gentleman, blood—family—cuts some figure and is a potent factor to that result. His early educational advantages were meager. His environment was not of the highest kind, which we term "polite society," but he came of good, honest stock. He was born and reared among good, honest people, and he lived and died a genuine gentleman that invokes those beautiful lines by Eliza Cook:

> Nature, with a lavish hand, sends forth her nobly born,
> And laughs the paltry attributes of wealth and rank to scorn.
> She molds with care a spirit rare, half human, half divine,
> And cries, exulting, "Who can make a gentleman like mine?"

The profoundest characteristic of this worthy man may be summed up in the simple and trite expression, "He was an honest man." And by honesty I mean more than that mere sense of obligation of which we sometimes speak as commercial honor. I mean more than a mere sense of duty to obey law and to discharge legal obligations. I mean a far deeper thing than that. That is superficial honesty; that is an honesty that may spring of policy and may be forced by intellectual recognition of its advantages.

The Great Teacher, in the profoundest of his parables, in which He likens men to soil and the Word to seed sown, depicts the fact that only that seed prospered which fell in "good and honest soil." Real honesty is a gift of God worked out in those infinite processes which compose the law of heredity, and under all circumstances, under any environment, they will work out true results.

Such an honest man was JOHN M. PINCKNEY, a man inherently honest, a man built to be honest, a man who desired to be nothing else but honest, a man whose fiber of soul was as true to truth as the magnet to the current that animates it.

He also was a brave man, and I mean here, as in the other case, more than that bravery partaken of by the brute, more than that physical nerve to engage in a personal encounter. I mean that bravery which springs up in the human soul as a result of the sense of right, and which is the sister of honesty in the human heart; that bravery which knows no fear when once it conceives its duty. This man's career, as strikingly as any of the great of earth, revealed the fact that he was brave in the highest and best sense. Whether you differed with him as to his convictions upon which he went into the great civil conflict, whether you differed with him in his views in this or that case when he prosecuted in the courts of the country, whether you differed from him in his views that led in part, unfortunately, to his tragic death, whatever your view may have been, as opposed to his upon any issue, if you knew him you recognized that they were sincere, honest, manly, brave, and that he would not be swerved and would not be turned by any consideration of the result of his advocacy of the conviction.

It follows from these two things, that were deep in the man's soul, as day follows night, that he was a loyal patriot; that he was a sincere, unwavering friend; that he was devoted to every object of his affection. I have never heard, and I believe no other living man ever heard, in all the bitter contests of JOHN M. PINCKNEY'S life, his worst enemy proclaim that he had ever been false to a friend. He was as intense in this respect as any man I ever knew. I never came in personal contact with any man in all my experience who I thought had a higher sense of loyalty to his friendship, as well as his devotion to his principles and his duties. The man had a great heart. Not only his career as a soldier and as a citizen, not only his devotion as a friend, but his matchless affection, long-continued, for his sister, is one of the most wonderful things in the career of any man I know in history, in any age—anywhere.

His maiden sister managed his home. She was mother, sister, daughter, sweetheart, all rolled into one. And no fond father, no devoted brother, no lover ever worshiped the object of his affection more deeply and continuously than JOHN M. PINCKNEY worshiped his sister, Miss Sue, as she was commonly and generally called. You have heard it described here by other colleagues how for years, when separated from her in the discharge of his duties as district attorney and in other positions in life, it was his daily custom to write this sister a letter. Ah, it is the little things in life that touch our hearts; it is the little things in life that go to make up the great sum of human character that at last, in the day of final account, glorify the human soul.

This devotion was really pathetic. No mention of the man's life would be complete without a mention of this remarkable affection borne between this maiden sister and this old bachelor. No language can soften the grief of that heart. I would that I had power, I would that language had not so great limitation, so that it were possible that some of us could utter something here that would fall with softening effect upon that sorrowing heart.

Nothing can be said, humanly speaking, that can soften her sorrow. If, as we hope and fondly believe, she be one of those whose faith is anchored within the vale, who can look with Christian eyes beyond the dark river and contemplate the glories of a future state beyond this, she may soften her grief and her sorrow by the hope that is left her, and all who grieve as she does, in the great beyond.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I can add nothing to what has already been said in beautiful tribute to the memory of JOHN M. PINCKNEY. It is fit that on this beautiful Sabbath day, this day that is dedicated to rest and worship, when tree and flower are feeling the touch of a new resurrection, we should meet to honor the memory of as brave and lofty a spirit as ever walked among men. We speak no cold and formal words of eulogy of our dead to-day, for if he could speak to us from that mysterious and echoless shore JOHN M. PINCKNEY would spurn such words if spoken.

We come to voice a grief that is sincere, and to honor ourselves and our State by paying tribute to our colleague who has solved the mysteries of death.

The birth of our friend was under humble conditions, but in his veins flowed the blood of a heroic race and an illustrious family, he being a descendant of the old Pinckney stock so distinguished in the early days of this Republic. He was a native of the district which he so faithfully represented here. His whole life was spent among these people, and they, better than all others, were acquainted with his virtues and his frailties, and the love his own people had for him is the surest testimonial to his worth.

I know of no surer test to apply to determine the worth of a man than to judge him in this way. A man here is viewed through a light that diminishes and reduces him below what he really is. If he is viewed through the partial glasses of relatives or intimate friends, he is unduly enlarged; but when he is measured by the regard of his own people as a whole, where neither intense friendship nor intense hostility refract the light, a fair estimate of his character can be reached.

At the time of his birth Texas was just laying aside the scepter as an independent republic and was taking her place as a State of this Union. It was then far out upon the border line of civilization. Her vast prairies were then unsettled and her great forests were unpeopled. His early years were spent amidst the dangers and hardships of this frontier life. His opportunities for an education were limited. While he was but a slender, beardless boy, he donned the uniform of the Confederacy and went out with the other brave spirits who formed Hood's immortal brigade of Texans. At second Manassas, at Gaines Mill, at Sharpsburg, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, the Wilderness, and upon a hundred other battlefields he looked death in the face without faltering. He fell, seriously wounded, in the Wilderness, but finally recovered. He suffered the horrors of captivity, but escaped. He was with the ragged and famishing battalions that Lee, the knightliest soldier of all time, surrendered to Grant, the generous one.

To me there is something inexpressibly sad in the thought that this House is now honored by the presence of so few of those who participated in that great struggle upon either side. As the years go by their ranks are growing thinner and thinner here on earth, and fewer and fewer are those who answer to roll call in either branch of Congress. They were the choicest spirits that the world ever saw, and their record here has been no less honorable than their conduct upon the field of battle.

When he returned from the war he became the support of his invalid father and of his brothers and sisters. He had neither child nor wife to lavish his affection upon and so he gave it in generous measure to brothers and sister and orphan children. Mention has already been made of the sweet and tender love between him and his sister. To him she represented all that was tender and beautiful and good in woman; to her he was all that was noble, brave, and heroic in man. When separated, as they rarely were, neither the labor of his profession nor the cares of official position ever prevented him from sending his daily message of love to his "Sukey," as he fondly called her.

When the convention met that first nominated him, the contest was bitter and the result uncertain. When finally he was nominated, he was sent for to address the convention, and amidst the applause of friends he was escorted to the platform. In that hour he forgot all about personal triumphs, but with tearful eyes said, "Boys you have made my sister the happiest woman in all the world to-day."

It was told of him that when in the heat of the campaign it was charged that he really belonged to the Prohibition party because of his bitter opposition to the liquor traffic, he said: "I am a Democrat. If you don't believe that I am, go ask my sister Sue." In the mind of this brave and simple old man there was no right of appeal from the judgment of that sister.

I pray God to pity her and care for her in this night of loneliness and sorrow to her. Within a few short months she was bereft of three brave brothers by the hand of violence. In a letter to one of my colleagues she says: "Had any woman such awful trouble as is on me? Day and night I think of them. If the sun shines, my soul is sick; there are no dear boys here to enjoy it. If it rains, the raindrops that fall on their graves also fall upon my heart."

While we conduct these exercises here today, in far-off Texas, in a little cottage she sits with streaming eyes and breaking heart, caressing the blood-stained garments of her loved one, whispering to herself his name and living over in sorrowful memory the years of the past with him.

I rejoice that it was my privilege to serve with JOHN PINCKNEY in this House, and to know him. I admired and loved him because he had lived such a life of sacrifice for others; because he had been such a knightly soldier; because he was as gentle as a women and as simple as a child.

He was not a politician, as the word is commonly used. He despised all the arts of the demagogue and all the practices of trickery and hypocrisy. He did not pretend to be what he was not. He was a plain, old-fashioned Texan, faithful to truth as he saw it and to duty as he understood it.

I thank God that we live in a land that produces such men and that honors such men and that is blessed with the memory of such men. He was not a great man, as the world usually measures greatness. Limited in opportunity and education he possessed but ordinary ability and ordinary attainments. Yet he was a great man as measured by the truer standards of greatness. He was a man who dared to look his duty in the face and to follow, though by doing so he walked alone and in the night. He was a man who loved truth above all things else. He was a man who forgot himself and by the light of that sacrifice dedicated himself to the service of his fellow-man.

His death was a cruel and needless sacrifice. His heart was pierced by the bullet of a cowardly assassin. He died as he had lived, pleading for the supremacy of the law and the protection of the helpless.

The tired hands of our colleague are folded now and the weary eyes are closed forever. Above his grave the blue skies of his beloved Texas bend, but he sees them not; the flowers are blooming about him, but he catches not their fragrance, the southern breezes whisper above his resting place, but he feels them not; the mocking bird sings wondrous melodies above his dust, but he hears them not. Let us hope that his spirit abides 'neath e'en fairer skies, where sweeter flowers blossom and gentler breezes blow and where the strains of heavenly music thrill his soul.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, JOHN M. PINCKNEY was a genuine son of the old South. He had the virtues and characteristics of a long line of slave-holding ancestors, with but few of their vices. He was brave, honest, patriotic, unselfish, and the ruling principle of his nature was the performance of every duty intrusted to him.

While he was yet a raw boy in his teens, on his father's plantation, the great civil war burst upon the country. With youthful ardor he threw aside his school books and enlisted in Company G, Fourth Texas Infantry, then commanded by the Marshal Ney of the Confederacy, John B. Hood. He was with the Confederacy from its beginning to its end. He sat by its cradle; he followed its hearse.

He marched with his command from Houston, Tex., to Richmond, Va. There his regiment was incorporated, with other Texas regiments, into Hood's famous brigade, which was the finest brigade of the finest division of the finest corps of the finest army that ever marched to battle, that body of incomparable infantry, that array of tattered uniforms and bright muskets, the Army of Northern Virginia, which, as has been eloquently and truly said, "carried for four years the revolt of the South on its bayonets and died only with its annihilation."

If the many battles, marches, and victories of Hood's Texas brigade could be written, truly its story would rival the Odyssey in adventure, romance, and thrilling interest. They won glorious victories in Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee. More than a half dozen States were the theater of their brilliant exploits in arms. At Yorktown, Williamsburg, Seven Pines, and the seven days' battles around Richmond, second Manassas, South Mountain, Sharpsburg, Fredericksburg, Suffolk, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, Campbell Station, Knoxville, Bulls Gap, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court-House, Cold Harbor, in a hundred battles around Petersburg and Richmond, its plume floated bravely and defiantly on the red crest of battle and where the storm was fiercest, there was JOHN M. PINCKNEY.

Often have I heard him tell how, in the late afternoon of the 15th day of September, 1862, Hood's brigade, with worn and wasted ranks, stood on the fatal field of Sharpsburg, and right across the Antietam River they beheld McClellan's vast army unrolling for battle. When Hood's heroes saw this mighty host arrayed against them and looked around on their thin, gray line they shuddered, but just then they turned around and there on the hill behind them they saw outlined against the sky the heroic figure of their great commander, that god of battles, General Lee, seated on his charger and calmly surveying the scene of the coming contest. When Hood's brave veterans saw their great commander they raised a shout of exultation which cheered their comrades all down the line and carried defiance to the brave foes in front of them. In the crisis of the battle of the Wilderness, when General Lee put himself in front of Hood's Texas brigade to lead a desperate charge against the victorious enemy, it was a comrade of JOHN M. PINCKNEY who seized hold of his horse's bridle, and JOHN M. PINCKNEY joined in the shout, "General Lee to the rear, and then we will go to the front." Where the strife was direst there was the Texas Brigade.

In the very forefront of all of its desperate battles stood JOHN M. PINCKNEY.

In the winter of 1864 and 1865, when this gallant band had been reduced to hardly a respectable company in numbers, it was proposed to consolidate them with a North Carolina brigade. A delegation, of which JOHN M. PINCKNEY was a member, was sent to General Lee to protest against their destruction as a brigade. General Lee joined in their protest and gave them a letter to President Davis. When old Howdy Martin, who was made the head of the delegation, found President Davis and eloquently protested against the destruction of their autonomy as a brigade, the stout heart of the inflexible and resolute Davis relented. He burst into tears and told the ragged veterans in front of him to go back to their command; as long as the Confederacy lived and he was its chief executive never would that great, grand old brigade cease to preserve its original organization. The gray and grizzled veterans carried back this message to their comrades, and in all subsequent battles they made good the confidence reposed in them by General Lee and Jefferson Davis.

JOHN M. PINCKNEY marched with his brigade into Richmond on the Sunday preceding its evacuation. He there boarded the cars for Petersburg, and on the way looked back and saw the whole sky aflame with the conflagration of the capital of the Confederacy. When he reached Petersburg he there saw Generals Lee and Longstreet seated on their horses gazing woefully on the remnant of the brave old Army of Northern Virginia marching in the gloomy night away from the scene of its many trials and victories.

JOHN M. PINCKNEY fought all the way to Appomattox. There he stacked his arms with the few survivors of his brave old brigade, marched back to Texas with a broken heart, ruined fortune, and to a destroyed home. He girded himself anew for the battle of life, and in peaceful civil pursuits lived out his appointed days.

By the voluntary suffrage of his friends and countrymen he was elected to many honorable and responsible offices, the difficult duties of which he always performed successfully, faithfully, and well. In every conflict of opinion he always stood for righteousness and for right. Dying, he left behind him an untarnished name and spotless record. No monument marks his final resting place, but there where he sleeps are sepulchered the ashes of one of the best, the bravest, and noblest of men.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, we turn once more on this Sabbath day to the contemplation of death. "All that live must die—passing through nature to eternity." The rich and the poor, the humble and the great alike, must fall before this enemy of mankind.

There is a spirit which haunts us night and day, in sunshine and sorrow, evermore repeating this warning:

Vain man, thy fond pursuits forbear;
Repent; thy end is nigh.
Death, at the farthest, can't be far—
Oh, think before thou die.

"All we know, or dream, or fear of agony" is embraced in death. Nature, experience, conscience all sound in our ears the melancholy truth:

To die, to sleep;
To sleep: perchance to dream: ay, there's the rub:
For in that sleep of death what dreams may come,
When we have shuffled off this mortal coil,
Must give us pause.

In the sad and tragic death of JOHN M. PINCKNEY the State of Texas lost a useful and loyal citizen; this House a patient, attentive, and valuable Member, and each one of us who knew him well a faithful and warm-hearted friend. Outside of his own delegation perhaps he had no better friend in this body than myself. We often walked up Pennsylvania avenue together after the adjournment of the House.

I was always interested in the accounts he gave of the various engagements in which Hood's celebrated brigade participated. Many of these occurred in the territory that now forms a part of the district I represent. The topography is familiar to me, and I participated in several of these engagements. The modesty with which he referred to his own part in these battles impressed me greatly. Gentleness was among the many virtues of our deceased colleague. I recall many conversations with him in and out of this Chamber that impressed this fact on my mind.

From the notices of his sad taking off, published in the Texas papers and loaned me by my friend and colleague Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD, I could easily see that this trait of character had won him lasting friends in his district.

The poet had in his mind's eye just such a character when he sung:

His life was gentle, and the elements
So mixed in him that nature
Might stand up and say to all the world,
This was a man.

His love for his kindred, and devotion to his friends, as well as loyalty to his State and party are beautifully portrayed in the extracts from the papers published in Texas at the time of his death.

I may well leave these to be elaborated on by the members of his delegation, while in a few simple words I put on record my tribute to a friend, colleague, and old comrade in arms.

He showed in this House, in every conversation, his deeds on the battlefield, and even in the very last moments of his tragic death, that—

The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring.

In the death of our colleague and friend another private soldier of the immortal band that followed the fortunes of the Army of Northern Virginia through victory and defeat for four long years has answered the long roll call. He has joined the great majority. For all we know he may be now listening to debates such as this House can never hear, and could not comprehend if heard. In the council chamber of the spirit land he may have learned ere this why so often on our little earth—

Truth was on the scaffold and error on the throne.

He doubtless knows what he and others have strived oftimes to learn—why freedom and independence was denied a brave people who deserved, yet failed, to win success. For all we know, his emancipated spirit tries in vain to tell us, both in our waking and sleeping hours, the manifold truths of which we can not even dream.

Even the "laws of the spirit," of which we know so little, because fettered by a casket of clay, must have their metes and bounds. Some day we will know even as now he knows.

A soldier of the Army of Northern Virginia can well imagine a reunion of the choice spirits of that noble band that composed the rank and file of Hood's Texas Brigade.

Believing, as most of us do, that life has no end, and is one continuous progress and evolution, we can fancy no condition when the deeds and actions of a former state of being will not be food for thought and subject of comment.

If this be so—and there is no good reason for doubting it—then our colleague is enjoying spiritual communion with his old comrades in arms in a city not built with hands, where sorrows and disappointments are not known and death never enters.

Our deceased friend and colleague was a private soldier of that "incomparable body of men, the glorious infantry of the Army of Northern Virginia" that so often hurled back in confusion the splendidly equipped legions of the North. They immortalized Lee and glorified Jackson and will live in song and story while the history of Marathon and Thermopylæ fires the heart of patriotism and the charge of Balaklava brightens the lamp of chivalry.

Survivors of the war between the States on either side have observed and commented often on the unselfish devotion of the private soldier.

The general, the colonel, the major, the captain, charged with responsibility and nerved with ambition, too often soldiers of fortune, had a stimulus and hope of reward that did not often stir the private soldier. His breast was fired and his arm nerved by devotion to duty.

He was in many cases better born and more intelligent than his officers, yet he was obedient to orders and marched into the jaws of death with a heroism and courage that has challenged the admiration of the world. He knew in the story of the battles the officers' names would be mentioned, and, if among the slain, they would be borne to well-marked tombs, over which loving hands and grateful hearts would spread flowers and shed tears, while over his own grave, unmarked—unnamed most likely—the winds would sing a sad requiem, and no loving hand would plant a single flower.

A soldier of the Second Virginia Cavalry, in pathetic verse, has epitomized this subject, and a lady in Loudoun County, Va., has put the words to music.

Often around the camp fires I have heard soldiers sing:

"All quiet along the Potomac," they say,
Except here and there a stray picket
Is shot, as he walks on his beat to and fro,
By a rifleman hid in the thicket.

'Tis nothing—a private or two now and then
Will not count in the news of the battle;
Not an officer lost—only one of the men—
Moaning out, all alone, the death rattle.

All quiet along the Potomac to-night
Where the soldiers lie peacefully dreaming;
Their tents, in the rays of the clear autumn moon
Or in the light of their camp fires, gleaming.

A tremulous sigh as a gentle night wind
Through the forest leaves softly is creeping,
While the stars up above with their glittering eyes
Keep guard o'er the army while sleeping.

There is only the sound of the lone sentry's tread,
As he tramps from the rock to the fountain,
And thinks of the two on the low trundle bed
Far away in the cot on the mountain.

His musket falls back, and his face dark and grim,
Grows gentle with memories tender,
As he mutters a prayer for the children asleep,
For their mother—may heaven defend her!

The moon seems to shine as brightly as then,
That night when the love yet unspoken
Leaped up to his lips and when low murmured vows
Were pledged to be ever unbroken.

Then, drawing roughly his sleeve o'er his eyes,
He dashes off tears that are welling,
And gathers his gun close up to its place
As if to keep down the heart swelling.

He passes the fountain, the blasted pine tree,
His footsteps are lagging and weary;
Yet onward he goes through the broad belt of light
Toward the shades of the forest so dreary.

Hark! was it the night wind rustled the leaves?
Was it moonlight so wond'rously flashing?
It looked like a rifle. "Ha! Mary, good-by!"
And the lifeblood is ebbing and plashing.

All quiet along the Potomac to-night,
No sound save the rush of the river;
While soft falls the dew on the face of the dead—
That picket's off duty forever.

Again we may draw some useful lessons from the contemplation of our colleague as a type of the Confederate soldier who survived that struggle and entered at once upon another that challenged to the utmost his courage, patience, and endurance.

The obstacles overcome and the victories won by our friend in this field of endeavor will be told by others better equipped for the task than I can possibly be.

The way in which the southern soldiers gathered up the fragments and rebuilt their waste places after the war was simply marvelous. The cold facts, gathered from statistics, will show them as active in peace as they had been in war. Here, too, the individual apparently counted for little, but he helped to swell the sum total of the striving masses who have been laying surely, if slowly, the foundations of new structures destined to surpass in wealth and power those that went down in the fierce conflict of battle.

Toward this rehabilitation JOHN M. PINCKNEY contributed his full share in the State of Texas, as his colleagues from that State have shown this day.

We will cherish his memory and pray that peace and contentment may follow those who directly bind that memory to earth.

It will not be long before some of us shall join him on the other shore. Death is no more mysterious than life.

So live, that, when thy summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan that moves
To that mysterious realm where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not like the quarry slave at night
Scourged to his dungeon; but, sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach thy grave
Like one that wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker, emotions weird and numberless overwhelm us as we turn from the grave whose gates are closing on the form of some beloved companion and wander among the castles of the dust. As meditation deepens we see the shadowy outlines rise until the melancholy habitations of the dead surround us in unending vistas. It is a universe of gloom, an empire of the night. On every wall and tower sits the scepter of the dark. In every chamber solitude is unquestioned monarch. We speak, but only an inaudible whisper leaves the lips. We tread the pallid passages, but no sound betrays our steps. We see the phantom multitudes—the fleshless fingers, the ghastly brows, the pulseless frames—myriads on myriads pouring from a vast and dim horizon, a noiseless Niagara of the dead. They swell the twilight avenues and flood the fragile palaces, a dismal pageantry that ceases not but ever multiplies. We see the forms of those we love. With grief unspeakable we observe the features stark, the bloodless lips, the lifeless eyes in which shine neither recognition nor affection, but only the feeble glimmer of decay. In the desperation of an agony which a strange paralysis chains unuttered in the soul we reel against that tide of death to find the vision vanished and in its place a cemetery with a city near at hand.

In contemplation of the grave a thousand fantasies arise. It is the theme of all themes most prolific in the literature of the world. In the oldest writings known to man—the Vedas, Brahmas, and Avestas—it was the source of the profoundest speculation. Its origin was conjectured in the strains of Hesiod. It was defied and satirized in the philosophy of Epicurus and Lucretius. It was exalted in the meditations of Aurelius. It gave a somber emphasis to the barbaric melodies of Beowulf and all the war chants of the Saxon time. It touched with resistless sorrow the flaunting cynicism of the Rubaiyat. It darkened the life of Petrarch, who emptied his heart in crimson sonnets on the tomb of Laura. It was apotheosized in Milton's classic grief for Lycidas, wherein the bard immortal bids

* * * amaranthus all his beauty shed
And daffadillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureate hearse where Lycid lies.

It prompted the pathetic imagery of Robert Blair, the elegy of Thomas Gray. It suggested to the observant genius of Johnson the famous dirge upon the vanity of human wishes. It added horror to the wild imaginings of Poe. It freighted with a pathos deep and exquisite his lamentations for the lost Lenore, his distress for the death of Annabel Lee, and the journeyings to the tomb of Ulalume.

Down by the dank tarn of Auber,
In the ghoul-haunted woodland of Weir.

Such are the reflections with which we approach the commemoration of the death of JOHN MCPHERSON PINCKNEY, reflections saddened beyond all measure by the recollection of his infinite nobility. He combined the qualities of a brave and spotless manhood. Honor radiated from his soul, while truth sat on his brow as on a throne. He was in manner gentle and in action firm. His faith was perfect and his love sincere. Friendship was his altar and justice his shrine. Purity in purpose and courage in execution were the striking elements of his nature, and in his lofty philosophy duty was but another word for God.

Although a native of Texas, he was a descendant of the Pinckneys of South Carolina, who were conspicuous among the founders of the Republic and who adorned the history of their State and the nation with examples of patriotism and ability. His early existence was one of uneventful toil. From the reluctant earth he was compelled by stern conditions to aid in obtaining the necessities of life for a crippled father and a family of brothers and sisters. Thus was impressed upon his tender years the principle of unselfish love which ennobled his entire career. When he was 16 years of age the American civil war began, and he became a Confederate soldier. He took part as a private in Hood's brigade in nearly all the important battles and campaigns of that mighty struggle, surrendering with Lee at Appomattox. His bearing on the field and in the camp was flawless. He was faithful to comrade and loyal to commander. He was cheerful in the bivouac, tireless on the march, and terrible in the charge. His daring on one occasion led to his capture, but he was soon released. He was thrice wounded, once quite seriously. The close of the contest found him a veteran of one of the greatest wars in history at the age of 20.

He returned to his home to face the forces of reconstruction, enemies to be more dreaded than the forces of invasion by which he had been overpowered. In common with his countrymen he began the task of rebuilding a shattered land. He labored at various employments for ten years, being still the principal support of the family. Whatever respite he could secure was utilized in the study of law and general literature, and in 1875 he was admitted to the bar. When it is recalled that during the most impressionable period of his youth he had been subjected to the demoralizing influences of war, that after the conclusion of hostilities society was in an unsettled and perilous condition and that the demands upon his time and means strained his energies to the utmost, we may begin to comprehend the moral strength and resolution with which he discharged every obligation to his family and his country and yet found time to cultivate the gentler graces of the mind and to prepare successfully for the bar.

He was an able and progressive lawyer. He was a vigorous and convincing advocate, a frank and honest counselor. His professional conduct was above question. His conception of his relation to court, to client, and to adversary rested on the highest ethical basis. He would never sacrifice principle for gain nor truth for tainted victory. It was not purely as a lawyer, however, that he achieved a commanding position in the community. The people knew that above the lawyer stood the man. They came to love him for his worship of right, his devotion to justice, and for the stainless splendor of his integrity. The people as a whole, Mr. Speaker, possess a remarkable power of analysis, an unerring judgment of sincerity in public men. They seem to know by some mysterious instinct when public servants are prompted by proper or improper motives. It may be that for this reason the voice of the people is said to be divine. At any rate it is certain that the people of JOHN M. PINCKNEY'S section came intuitively to regard him as the embodiment of law, the personification of its majesty. He was elected to the office of prosecuting attorney. The people summoned him to combat the elements which threatened the overthrow of society, and his response was prompt and manful. For ten years he championed the peace and dignity of the State. As a prosecutor he was utterly fearless and wonderfully effective.

At the close of his service as district attorney he became, in 1900, county judge of his home county. When he was nominated for Congress at Houston in 1903 the people of Hempstead, the place of his residence, prepared a joyful reception. As he stepped from the train that had borne him home the shouts of multitudes, the peals of music, the clangor of bells united in a tumultuous but happy welcome. First to greet him was his sister, Miss Sue Pinckney, whom he loved and worshipped with a constancy as rare as it was beautiful. Between them had existed a devotion for which the language of poets, the canvas of artists, the marble of sculptors have no adequate expression. For more than half a century they had walked hand in hand through shadow and through light. Hardly a day had ever passed that they did not communicate in some way. As he embraced her on this supreme occasion the clamor immediately ceased and the great throngs in reverent silence observed this expression of as pure a love, a loyalty as sublime, as ever flowered in the human heart. Of his sister he once said:

I owe more to her than can ever be expressed, and the ambition of my life is so to live that I will be worthy of her affection.

It was when he assumed his seat in Congress that I made his acquaintance. We were drawn together by the fact that we were, respectively, the youngest and oldest Members of the Texas delegation. From acquaintance to friendship, from friendship to affection, were but short and eager steps. Our association here was most intimate. I had thorough opportunity to observe him in every phase and mood of life, and admiration rivaled love. He gave the closest and most conscientious attention to the proceedings of the House. He would remain in his seat through the tedious deliberations on long appropriation bills, evincing the liveliest interest in every motion and in every debate. When death retired him he was rapidly taking a high place among the most conservative and useful Members of this body. Of the civil war he frequently spoke. Of his record as a Confederate soldier he was justly proud. He accepted, however, the logic of Appomattox. He gloried in a reunited country and a common flag. He believed with Jefferson Davis that on the arch of the Union should be written, "Esto perpetua"—be thou perpetual.

The significance of his life lies in the fact that he was a typical Confederate soldier. Earth has no higher title. As I heard from his laconic lips the story of that giant strife I saw the hosts in battle line. I saw the thinning rank through four tempestuous years yield slowly to superior force. I heard the thundrous prelude of Manassas. I saw the fires of Carthage, Lexington, Columbus, and Ball's Bluff. I saw the surge of Shiloh's thousands, the clash of the legions at Murfreesboro. I saw the crimson skies of Malvern Hill, of Antietam, and of Fredericksburg. I saw the carnage of Chickamauga and Missionary Ridge. I heard the crash of Jackson's columns against the opposing myriads at Chancellorsville. I saw the charge at Gettysburg. I saw the gleam of a million bayonets encircle the tattered groups of gray. In the gloom of the Wilderness I saw them approach the superbest martyrdom since Calvary's agonies made all defeat and sorrow holy. And when the tumult of the conflict fell there rose above the ashes of Southern hopes and homes a cross that bore the figure of a Confederate soldier. Beyond the waste of nineteen hundred years I saw that other cross on which a God had died; and I knew that through my tears I saw the two sublimest sacrifices of God for man, and man for his conception of the truth.

Sleep, warrior, sleep. Your unimprisoned soul now mingles with the armies in the tents of light, where blue and gray together welcome every comrade to the rank immortal, armies summoned to the peace of endless morning by reveilles from the lips of God—enemies no more, but brothers there and their united children brothers here, forever and forever.

[Mr. RANDELL of Texas addressed the House. See Appendix.]

And then, in pursuance of the resolution heretofore adopted, the House (at 12 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 30, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last, when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

NAVAL AND POSTAL EMERGENCIES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back without amendment the bill (H. R. 18709) making additional appropriations for the public service on account of earthquake and attending conflagration on the Pacific coast, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $100,000 to enable the Secretary of the Navy to employ such additional laborers and mechanics as may, in his judgment, be necessary for immediate service under the Bureau of Steam Engineering in the navy-yard at Mare Island, Cal., to remain available until June 30, 1906, and to appropriate $70,000 to enable the Postmaster-General, in his discretion, to meet emergencies in the postal service in the State of California occasioned by earthquake and fire, to be paid out of the revenues of the postal service and to remain available until June 30, 1906.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A bill (H. R. 15977) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Ramsey;

A bill (H. R. 16186) granting an increase of pension to William T. A. H. Boles; and

A bill (H. R. 16271) granting an increase of penison to Edwin Elliott.

Mr. GEARIN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 215) granting a pension to Elias Phelps, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4133) granting an increase of pension to George Brewster, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, after the morning business, I should like to address the Senate on the rate bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The notice will be duly entered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 5951) to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5952) granting an increase of pension to Hyacinth Dotey; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAYNER introduced a bill (S. 5953) to appropriate money for the payment of certain advances made to the United States by the State of Maryland; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McENERY introduced a bill (S. 5954) for the relief of the Union National Bank of New Orleans, as the successor of the Union Bank of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 5955) granting a pension to Mary Elizabeth McCann; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McCREARY, introduced a bill (S. 5956) to correct the military record of Milton Newcomb; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5957) granting an increase of pension to Laban Rupard; which was read twice by its title, and, with an accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 5958) granting a pension to Bernard Charles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5959) granting a pension to Catherine A. Wright; and

A bill (S. 5960) granting an increase of pension to George H. Eastman.

Mr. CARTER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5961) granting an increase of pension to Eugene B. McSwyny; and

A bill (S. 5962) granting an increase of pension to John A. Richards.

Mr. KNOX introduced a bill (S. 5963) granting an increase of pension to James Reed; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 5964) for the relief of the heirs of William Bullard, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. I introduce a bill, which I ask may be read at length on its second reading.

The bill (S. 5965) to establish the plan of a ship canal to be constructed in the Panama Canal Zone, ceded to the United States by the Republic of Panama, under the provisions of the treaty promulgated on the 26th day of February, 1904, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is authorized to construct a ship canal in pursuance of the general plan hereinafter described, between the 40-foot contour in the Bay of Limon, Caribbean Sea, and the 40-foot contour in the Bay of Panama, to connect the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans through the Panama Canal Zone.

The central section of said canal shall be constructed as a canal with locks, through the highlands of Culebra and Emperador, for the distance of about 8½ miles, to be connected with the sea-level sections at each end by means of locks to be located in the vicinity of Obispo and Miraflores. It shall be not less than 40 feet in depth between such locks, and shall be, at the surface thereof, not more than 85 feet, and not less than 65 feet above sea-level, as shall be determined by the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. For obtaining and securing a necessary supply of water to said central section, and for purposes of regulating the flow of the waters of the Chagres River, a sufficient and permanent dam shall be erected across said river in the vicinity of Gamboa on a suitable foundation of rock and in accordance with the general plan that is recommended in the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers submitted to Congress by the President in his message of February 19, 1906; and a channel shall be made between the lake created by such dam and the central section of the canal above mentioned, which shall be of sufficient dimensions, elevation, and capacity to supply water from such lake for all the purposes of floatation and lockage, the generation of power to aid in the construction and in the working said central section to its highest capacity and to serve its continued use for all commercial purposes, and also for service in the regulation of the waters impounded in such lake, which shall be known as "Lake Gamboa."

SEC. 3. That the northern sea-level section of the canal shall be constructed along the valleys of the Obispo and Chagres rivers, so as to connect with the northernmost lock of the central section in the vicinity of Obispo and shall extend to the 40-foot contour of the Bay of Limon.

Said northern section of the canal shall have a depth of 40 feet below mean sea level and shall correspond, practically, with the route, the location, the dimensions, and as to the protection of the same against inflowing waters, as the same are described in the report of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers above referred to, but the same shall be subject to such alterations thereof, in all respects except as to the sea-level plan, as the President of the United States shall direct or approve.

SEC. 4. That the southern section shall be a sea-level canal, to be constructed from the southernmost lock of the central section, and so as to connect with it in the vicinity of Miraflores, to the 40-foot contour in the Bay of Panama by the most practical route. It shall not be less than 40 feet deep below the mean sea level and not less than 200 feet wide at any place. It shall be provided with a sea gate or left without such protection according to the direction or approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 5. That the locks of the canal shall be double or twin locks, with usual capacity of not less than 800 feet in length and not less than 80 feet in width or less than 40 feet in depth over the miter sills. The locks shall not be placed in flights, but shall be located as nearly in connection with each other as may be safe and convenient, having regard to the permanent stability of the foundations thereof, and the location of the respective sets of twin or double locks and the plan and method of construction of such locks shall conform to the best and most economical use of water supply from Lake Gamboa for the most advantageous operation of the central section of the canal, all under the direction or approval of the President of the United States.

Mr. MORGAN. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. PILES submitted an amendment providing that leave of absence authorized by law to clerks in post-offices shall be construed exclusively of Sundays and holidays, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment relative to the pay and allowances of civil engineers and professors of mathematics in the Navy, intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—FRANCES A. BLISS.

On motion of Mr. BURNHAM, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of S. 3631, first session Fifty-ninth Congress, "For relief of Frances A. Bliss," be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—FOREMAN S. WELLS.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the bill (S. 3679), Fifty-seventh Congress, for the relief of Foreman S. Wells, may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report thereon.

IRRIGATION FROM SACRAMENTO RIVER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the unfinished business, being House bill 12987, will be proceeded with.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. My friend the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] has a little matter of routine business that he desires to have transacted, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas kindly for the courtesy he has extended to me.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11796) for the diversion of water from the Sacramento River, in the State of California, for irrigation purposes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, on page 1, lines 8 and 9, to strike out "900 cubic feet per second of water" and insert "an amount of water which, at a stage of said river of 2 feet above low water, as determined by the United States engineer in charge of the improvement of said river, or at any lower stage, shall not exceed 900 cubic feet per second;" so as to read:

That the Central Canal and Irrigation Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, and its successors, are hereby granted the right to divert, at all seasons of the year, from the Sacramento River, in the State of California, while and so long as such diversion shall not seriously injure the navigation of said river, an amount of water which, at a stage of said river of 2 feet above low water, as determined by the United States engineer in charge of the improvement of said river, or at any lower stage, shall not exceed 900 cubic feet per second, to be used for irrigating the lands of the Sacramento Valley, on the west side of the Sacramento River, in said State of California.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 3, line 23, after the word "hereunder," to insert "instituted by the Government or any of its officers or agents;" so as to make the additional proviso read:

And provided further, That all costs accruing in any suit or proceeding hereunder instituted by the Government or any of its officers or agents shall be borne by the said Central Canal and Irrigation Company, its successors or assigns.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, on page 4, line 23, after the word "within," to strike out "one year" and insert "two years;" and in line 24 to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 4. That this act shall be null and void if the actual construction of the structures for diversion and measurement of water herein authorized be not commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the pending bill is supposed to be a legislative response to the public demand that something shall be done to put limitations on the power of the common carriers of this country to unfairly tax and control its commerce. The question has received fragmentary attention in Congress and in the legislatures of many of the States. But the remedies that have been worked out and applied from time to time have been so inadequate and inefficient that the public has become almost hopeless of getting relief from any scheme of mere regulation. The magnitude of the evils of extortion and discrimination by the public carriers has grown until it has forced itself upon the attention of the country to such an extent that Congress now finds itself appealed to to remedy the wrong by striking at the very source of it. I feel compelled to say that if the pending bill, without being amended liberally and substantially, is to be the response made by this Congress to that appeal, we shall stand before the country inviting one of two criticisms—either that we have a meager and erroneous conception of the overpowering and widespread evil that calls for correction, or a very limited capacity, and a much more limited disposition, to devise adequate remedies to suppress evils of magnitude after their existence become manifest.

The bill as it now stands, in my humble opinion, is based upon an erroneous theory of regulation from its very first provision to its last. It betrays a rare ignorance of the evils to be overcome and of the methods available to Congress in their suppression. In the first place, the bill provides for the correction of a single rate, or the rate upon a single classification of freight, rather than for a comprehensive regulation of the entire schedule of rates charged by any given carrier. Even the partial remedy provided in the correction of the evil presented by a single excessive rate is only to be made upon complaint involving the challenged rate. This should not be so. The business of compelling common carriers to discharge their duties to the public is governmental in its character, and should be approached with that independence and fairness that should characterize the discharge of public duties and the exercise of public power. No shipper or patron of the railroad should be compelled to involve himself in an adversary contention over the rates to be charged with the carrier. The contest is an unequal one. The means available to the offended carrier to punish and destroy the complaining shipper are too numerous and subtle to warrant the belief that the right of complaint will be independently and courageously exercised. When a course of conduct has become so notorious as to constitute a part of the everyday knowledge of life, it is the duty of those who hold the governmental power of correction to assume the burden of applying the remedy without exposing the interests of any citizen to the aroused resentment of the powerful class whose abuse of permitted opportunities and powers has made necessary a resort to the remedial powers of the Government. That the transportation of the country has been and is afflicted by a systematic and all-pervading burden of extortion and discrimination practiced by the carriers is a matter that is not seriously disputed.

The transportation facilities of the country have been combined to such a wide extent and in such close alliance that the matters of fixing the tax on transportation and of practicing discrimination between shippers and places are subject to no limitation except the arbitrary edict of those who control the business. Unless it be true that the transportation tax imposed by the limited number of persons who control the transportation facilities of the country is extortionate and confiscatory, then the agitation for the passage by Congress of a comprehensive and effective system for prescribing rates must be viewed in the light of a gigantic conspiracy against the commercial tranquillity of this country. The universality of the demand that Congress shall interpose the strong hand of the National Government to prevent imposition being practiced is evidence that those who are interested in our commercial prosperity and opportunities do not so regard this movement. That this sentiment pervades all classes of our people, and is persistently and earnestly pressed upon our attention, ought to convince us that it represents the conservative sentiment of the country, and is not due to any spirit of temporary unrest artificially produced by the irresponsible and sensational elements of our population. The agitation is the outgrowth of the nullification of the law of competition by the abnormal development of the evil of combination. I do not cry out against the men who have brought about this situation, for in doing so they have only pursued methods allowed by law, and have simply followed the bent of human instincts and inclinations. What they have done others would do, similarly situated. They are merely doing the things that education, environment, and interest qualify them to do, only too well for the general welfare of society. But legislative power is created to restrain, in some measure, the unfair assertion of selfish instincts.

In a strictly private employment, as long as a man avoids doing those things for which he might be put in jail, no one can legally complain; but when he seeks to unfairly advance his interest, at the expense of those who have equal rights, through the agency of a public privilege or franchise, he must submit to such regulations as will protect the rights of others and accord to him all to which he is legally entitled. The power of Congress to delegate to a commission the authority to prescribe rates to be charged by common carriers engaged in interstate commerce has been much disputed. I do not share the belief that there is any doubt about the authority of Congress to confer plenary power for this purpose. I think the right to confer this authority is a logical and inevitable extension of the doctrines and practices that have been declared and established by the court decisions and the course of legislation that have for their ultimate purpose the widening and broadening of national authority. Unless the Supreme Court of the United States has been uncandid with the public in what has been said in more than a score of decisions, the existence of this power must be admitted. That that great Court has not perpetrated a deception in this behalf I am convinced beyond all doubt. The power of the States to interfere with or regulate to any extent interstate commerce has been so uniformly denied that none now are bold enough to complain that it is so, to say nothing of insisting that it is otherwise. The Constitution says that all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people. It is certain, therefore, that this power to regulate interstate commerce has not been reserved to the States, as their powers in this behalf have been defined by the Supreme Court of the United States, which is the final arbiter in such matters.

LEGALITY, DELEGATION OF RATE-MAKING POWER DOUBTFUL.

Notwithstanding I admit without reservation the power of Congress to delegate to a commission the power of fixing the tax to be imposed upon the transportation of the country by the carriers, I am not so sure that the delegation attempted by this bill is a valid exercise of the power. The power delegated is to prescribe just and reasonable rates, without fixing any standard by which this fact of justice and reasonableness is to be determined. The rule by which the validity or invalidity of a given delegation of legislative power is made to appear is laid down in the recent case of Buttfield v. Stranahan. (192 U. S., 496.) It is there said that the delegation will be valid if it appears that Congress has legislated on the subject as far as was reasonably practicable and then, from the necessity of the case, is compelled to leave to executive officials the duty of bringing about the results pointed out by the statutes. It is obvious to anyone who gives a moment's consideration to the question that a mere general direction to prescribe railroad rates that will be just and reasonable leaves to the Commission a vast field for the exercise of discretion as to the policy and wisdom of adopting one course or another, which, when it eventuates in completed form, may be said to prescribe just and reasonable rates. As there are many ways in which this business of fixing just and reasonable rates can be accomplished, according to the judgment of the person rendering the service, the choice as between these means is a legislative one. I think that Congress should formulate as definitely as practicable the basis upon which, or the standard by which, the justice and reasonableness of rates should be ascertained. I think that it is competent for Congress—in fact, I deem it to be the duty of Congress—to provide for the ascertainment of the value of the property of the several railroad corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and by an established method that will afford to each transportation company an opportunity to be represented and heard in the inquiry which is to result in fixing the value of its property.

As human intelligence must enumerate the elements that enter into this aggregate valuation, Congress should indicate which of these elements and how many are to be considered in fixing the value. If the franchise value is to be deemed a part of the value of the investment for the purpose of ascertaining a basis upon which a reasonable return to the carrier is to be computed, it should say so in terms, that the rule may be observed in all cases. If the bond and stock flotations are to be considered for any other purpose than as a mere particle of evidence, throwing light upon the ultimate question of value, definite directions as to this should be given. Then I believe that after the basis of actual value has been ascertained in a way that will challenge respect and be recognized and enforced in all tribunals where it may become a material inquiry, that Congress should indicate what is to be deemed the extent of income that will satisfy the carrier's right to just and reasonable rates. It may be that in a country where conditions differ as widely in the several sections as is the case in ours that an arbitrarily fixed percentage would not in all cases do justice. But this can be provided for by arranging a minimum and maximum, within the limits of which the Commission can be guided in any given case.

It is not my intention to discuss at length the many obvious defects in this bill, because it is my purpose to devote the greater part of the time I shall impose myself upon the patience of the Senate to the discussion of a defect which pertains to a matter of procedure, by which the orders of the Commission, when made, may be relieved of interference by the inferior Federal courts of the country in the exercise of the unlimited right to grant preliminary injunctions. It is a matter of common knowledge among the lawyers of the country that the right to issue injunctions of this character has been abused very greatly in recent years. But whilst it is my purpose to confine myself largely to the discussion of this particular defect, I have not thought it to be proper to entirely omit reference to others.

RIGHTS OF RAILROAD CONSTITUTIONALLY PROTECTED.

The property rights of the carrier, in so far as the same may be affected adversely by Congressional legislation, are absolutely secured against wrongful invasion by the Constitution of the United States and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States practically applying and adapting the guaranties of that instrument. There is no possible way by which the common carriers of the country can be compelled to serve the public without receiving for the service just compensation for the use of their property so employed. These companies enjoy absolute immunity from any wrongful invasion of their rights by legislation. This has been decided so often that it has come to be understood as part of the elementary knowledge of the subject. I therefore maintain that it is the duty of Congress to occupy, with a system of comprehensive, intelligent, and effective regulation, every square inch of the territory which lies outside of the barriers of the Constitution, behind which the rights of the carriers are securely intrenched. Within this zone lie the rights of the public, and by the wrongful invasion of this domain by the carriers are the interests of the public injured and destroyed. The fact that the common carriers have not respected the rights of the public is our justification for seeking to devise and apply a remedy, as we are now doing. That some remedy should be applied all agree. The difference is as to the extent and effectiveness of the relief to be afforded. I believe that as our power is equal to our responsibility, the remedy we tender to the public should be as wide as the mischief, and that its execution should be along lines that will advance the remedy and suppress the mischief. In making these laws we should approach the duty in a frame of mind that will enable us to say that we have no conscientious scruples against doing what is right where the law and the evidence justify it.

The ingenuity of this particular class of lawbreakers has been strengthened and made familiar by an unobstructed exercise for many years, and any attempt upon the part of the lawmaker now to match his ingenuity against that of his adversary must be based upon a knowledge of the fact that he is dealing with one who has enjoyed his immunities so long that by toleration and acquiescence he has come to believe that his wrongdoing has become consecrated into a vested right. We shall not quit the subject with the consciousness of duty well performed if we put upon the statute book a law of meaningless generalities, that for practical purposes signifies nothing, and this, in my opinion, is what this bill unamended will do. We will find ourselves in the situation that the late John J. Ingalls said Kansas found herself in as the result of the adoption of a prohibition amendment to the State constitution. He said that the Prohibitionists of Kansas had all the law they wanted, and the whisky drinkers had all the whisky they wanted. I trust, therefore, that we shall not find that the railroad commission has all the law it wants, and the railroads are in the enjoyment of the right to collect all the rates they want. Although I say I trust that this will not be the result, if I were called upon to give a definite statement of my real opinion, I should find myself under the necessity of recording here and now the prediction that the passage of this bill, unamended in many substantial particulars, will result in a statutory condition that will never regulate, in the direction of a reduction, a single extortionate rate demanded by the railroads. It will amount simply to the introduction for a second time of the colorless regulation that was practiced by the Commission from 1887 to 1897, when it deemed itself to be possessed of the rate-making power. The power then supposed to exist was exercised so mildly that the railways of the country were unable to draw a distinction between the power of supervision exercised by the Commission and that exercised by their own traffic managers.

STATE AND INTERSTATE COMMERCE NOT DEFINED.

Another obvious defect in existing laws that is not remedied by the provisions of the pending bill is one made manifest in the decision of the Supreme Court in Smyth v. Ames, 169 United States. In that case the court says: "In our judgment, it must be held that the reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates prescribed by States for the transportation of persons or property wholly within its limits must be done without reference to the interstate business done by the carrier or the profits derived from it." Now, if a similar rule is to be applied, and there is no reason why it shall not be, in the ascertainment of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of rates fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the result is that when the State commissions attempt to fix rates for that part of the traffic which is wholly within the State no notice whatever can be taken of the business interstate in character, and when the National Commission proceeds to ascertain what is a reasonable rate for interstate business no notice can be taken of that part of the carrier's business which originates and ends in a particular State. This is a practical difficulty growing out of the dual character of the government under which the railroads operate, and ought to be definitely and decisively provided for in this bill. Unless the court shall recede from its position as established in that case, the omission from the present bill of some proper provision on this subject will constitute a defect the existence of which is not in the slightest degree complimentary to the information of its framers, assuming always that they were inspired by an honest purpose to correct the defects that are within the limits of their knowledge.

CONGRESS HAS POWER TO PREVENT ISSUE OF PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION IN ANY CASE.

But, as I said a moment ago, my main purpose in taking the floor to-day is to say something in support of the proposition that Congress has power to prohibit the courts from issuing a preliminary injunction suspending the orders of the Commission pending a final disposition in the United States circuit court. I shall not only claim that Congress has this power, but I shall insist that the considerations which support the demand for its exercise in this instance are stronger than those that can be advanced in support of any one of the three distinct instances where Congress has exercised that power heretofore and to the satisfaction and approval of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I shall also have something to say upon the scope and effect of the court review of the orders of the Commission. I think Congress has nothing to do with the character of the review. I believe that the extent of judicial review is fixed by the Constitution itself, as expounded by the decisions of the Supreme Court. It has been exercised up to the present time to the utmost limit that it ever will be extended. The widest delegation of authority to the courts would confer no greater power in this behalf than the most specific limitation which we could incorporate into the statute.

Under ordinary circumstances it would be necessary for Congress to consider only the wisdom and policy of denying a resort to that feature of the judicial remedy afforded by the process of a preliminary injunction, in the light of the facts and circumstances brought forward in support of the particular application for such prohibition. The power to do so would be conceded. But the respect due to any contention seriously made by the distinguished Senators from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] respecting a matter of law or procedure, presents a situation in which it well becomes those who would antagonize what they assert to be careful. Their deliberate support of any proposition will rescue it from any assault or criticism lightly made, and entitles it to be dealt with as one of the disputed questions of the law that can at least be attractively and plausibly exploited, if not successfully defended and maintained.

These Senators introduce for the first time, so far as any diligence I am capable of exercising has enabled me to locate any instance of its being done, a distinction between judicial power and the jurisdiction of a court to administer it. That courts can do many things incidental to the exercise of jurisdiction that are not specifically mentioned in the act creating the court and defining its jurisdiction is not denied. For instance, it inheres in the very function of the court that the judge or judges thereof shall have the right to choose as between conflicting or apparently conflicting principles those that will be recognized and applied as having the force of law in the decision of any given controversy. Nor can any legislative tribunal, in creating the court, direct the particular decision to be given, where the facts are conflicting or where the principles of law that would otherwise govern are established and recognized. The right to decide involves the right to choose the particular course of decision. But we have no such question here. We are dealing with the power of Congress to prescribe to one of the courts which owes its existence to legislative act a course of procedure in the merely incidental matter of issuing a process. The granting of a temporary injunction and the hearing incidental thereto rarely ever involve any consideration or decision as to the ultimate merits of the controversy. The effect is simply to preserve the subject-matter of the controversy in as nearly the same condition in which it is found as is practicable.

IF COURT HAS DISCRETION IN ONE CASE, CONGRESS HAS IN ALL OF A CLASS.

The grant or refusal of a preliminary injunction, therefore, only incidentally involves the ultimate rights of the successful litigant. In the very nature of things, the granting of such a process will disturb existing conditions, and it frequently calls for a nice balancing of consequences to determine whether greater harm will not result from the issue of the injunction than from its denial. The issue of the writ is therefore a matter of mere discretion with the judge or court to which application is made. This discretion is absolute, since no appeal will lie from a refusal to issue such a writ. It is not in any sense a suit or action, but is a mere process incidental to a suit or action. There is no such thing as a suit having for its independent and distinct purpose the mere issue of a preliminary injunction. It is the equivalent, in a court of equity, of the writ of attachment in a court of law. No reason is perceived why, if a writ of attachment may be denied in a court of law to seize and hold the property or its proceeds until the right thereto has been determined in an action, a similar right of abolition does not attach to the equivalent writ in a court of equity designed to accomplish the same purpose. There is nothing in the origin or history of the preliminary writ of injunction to controvert this suggestion to the extent of rendering it subject to the criticism of being unfairly applied here. This writ is the very counterpart of the interdict of the prætor under the Roman law. When the English chancery jurisdiction began to develop as a branch of the royal prerogative, the peculiar character of relief necessary to do justice effectively made it inevitable that in many cases injunctive relief should be granted in advance of the hearing, if justice was to be fully done in the end. We accordingly find in the very earliest recorded history of the chancery jurisdiction, when its powers were exerted and its remedies administered by the king in person, that preliminary injunctions were employed as a part of the system. It is said that the first recorded instance of a preliminary injunction being issued occurred in the time of Henry II. As the chancery jurisdiction was extended to the numerous cases where the harsh and technical rules of the courts of the common law would not enable them to do full justice, the writ of preliminary injunction was accordingly made use of more frequently.

The courts of equity are said to have been invented for the correction of that wherein the law, by reason of its universality, was deficient. The wholesome and effective character of relief to be gained in many cases through employment of the preliminary injunction where there would otherwise be a miscarriage of justice made the writ exceedingly popular, and this very popularity caused it to be abused to such an extent as to make it manifest to those who are charged with the duty of making laws to put limitations upon the right that would operate to prevent its abuse without impairing its real usefulness. Accordingly, we find that by legislation notice to the adversary party is required wherever it is practicable to give the same before making application for the writ. Certain judges are empowered to grant the writ, while others are denied the right by not having the same conferred upon them. Bonds are required to indemnify, as nearly as such a provision can, the persons whose rights are interfered with by the writ in the event it should be subsequently determined that it was wrongfully applied for and issued, and in some cases, in the exercise of the sovereign power to make laws, the legislature has denied to the courts the right to issue the writ at all. Our statute books contain three well-known instances where Congress has denied to the courts power to issue this writ, and its action in doing so has been expressly recognized and loyally respected by the Supreme Court of the United States, as I shall undertake to show as I proceed. I am not willing to be numbered among those who declaim vociferously against the employment of the writ of injunction; neither am I to be numbered among those who treat it as a specific for all the ills of life that are subject to judicial inquiry and determination. Our complex governmental and commercial conditions imperatively require that in a just determination of the numerous controversies that come about between individuals this writ shall at all times be available for rational and equitable service. But while I admit this, I also insist that it is a process whose employment is to be regulated by law, and that the law-making power not only has power, but it rests under an imperative obligation to deny its use whenever, in the exercise of its best judgment, it is apparent that the exercise of the power rightfully belonging to other governmental agencies will be unfairly obstructed in the due administration of the powers permitted to them. Whilst the process is important, and is therefore to be interfered with cautiously, and only after the propriety of doing so has been thoroughly considered and determined, yet the power to do so when the necessity for its exercise is made manifest is what we insist upon now.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION A MERE PROCESS.

As indicating that the writ of injunction is invariably treated as a mere process to be employed for incidental purposes in the administration of justice, and as such is subject to legislative control, it is permissible to call attention to the fact that in many of the States a reformed system of pleading and practice, known as the "code system," has been adopted, and in nearly all of these the writ of injunction has been in terms abolished by statute, and provision made by statute for the issuing of restraining orders by the judges and under the conditions therein named. Wisconsin is among the States that have pursued this course, as will be seen from the following extract from its revised statutes:

SEC. 2773. The writ of injunction is abolished. The injunction provided by law is a command to refrain from a particular act. It may be the final judgment in the action or may be allowed as a provisional remedy, and when so allowed it shall be by order in the form prescribed in this chapter. The order may be made by the court in which the action is brought or by a judge in the cases provided in this chapter, and when made may be enforced as the order of the court.

But our inquiry on this occasion is as to the authority of Congress to provide that the orders of the Interstate Railway Commission fixing rates shall not be suspended or interfered with by any preliminary injunction in advance of a decision by the circuit court.

That this is true ought to be considered as established, when we consider the nature of the National Government and the powers that it can rightfully exercise. In the first place, the National Government is one of delegated powers. There is no such thing as a national common law. There are therefore no common-law courts nor common-law powers of courts, nor does there exist any common-law source upon which courts may draw to supply themselves with desirable powers, which are inadvertently or otherwise withheld by statute. That this is true was recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States at a very early date, as will appear in the following extract from the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of Ex parte Bollman (8 Cranch, 93):

As preliminary to any investigation of the merits of this motion, this court deems it proper to declare that it disclaims all jurisdiction not given by the Constitution or by the laws of the United States. Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law until some statute shall change their established principles; but courts which are created by written law and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law can not transcend that jurisdiction. It is unnecessary to state the reasoning on which this opinion is founded, because it has been repeatedly given by this court, and with the decisions heretofore rendered on this point no member of the bench has, even for an instant, been dissatisfied. The reasoning from the bar in relation to it may be answered by the single observation that for the meaning of the term "habeas corpus" resort may unquestionably be had to the common law, but the power to award the writ by any of the courts of the United States must be given by written law.

It has not been denied in this debate nor anywhere else by those who are entitled to be heard in the discussion of such questions that all the courts of the United States inferior to the Supreme Court are of statutory origin and that only such part of the judicial power of the United States as Congress has assigned to these can be exercised by them, respectively. This is not only true as to the subject-matter of litigation, but it is true in reference to the pleadings, writs, and other matters of procedure through and by which the system of courts is created and in accordance with which they administer justice. None of these courts have ever attempted to issue any writ or to take cognizance of any proceeding without being able to predicate its action in doing so upon some statute either prescribing the rule or adopting the scheme of procedure prevalent in the States or in the high court of chancery of England. Attentive examination of the decisions of our Supreme Court will show that in every instance save one, that of Florida v. Georgia, in 17 Howard, that court has insisted upon statutory authority for every step taken by it or permitted to the inferior courts when challenged.

In the case of Florida v. Georgia the court did proceed to hear the controversy under a system of pleading and procedure established by itself, but in doing so it took occasion to say that it did this in the absence of legislation by Congress, in order that there might not be a failure of justice. But it broadly and unmistakably stated that if Congress had prescribed rules governing its procedure that it would be compelled to conform thereto. From the very earliest day, as early as 1789, Congress has assumed to provide the means by which the Federal courts could supply themselves with the necessary means and machinery for discharging the duties imposed upon them. I call attention to the following sections of the Revised Statutes, which were originally passed prior to 1842.

ALL PROCESS SUCH AS CONGRESS AUTHORIZES.

Section 716 of the Revised Statutes, indicated as section 14 of the act of 1879, provides:

The Supreme Court and the circuit and districts courts shall have power to issue writs of scirs facias. They shall also have power to issue all writs not specifically provided for by statute, which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions, and agreeable to the usages and principles of law.

Section 917 proves that—

The Supreme Court shall have power to prescribe, from time to time, and in any manner not inconsistent with any law of the United States, the forms of writs and other process, the modes of framing and filing proceedings and pleadings, of taking and obtaining evidence, of obtaining discovery, of proceeding to obtain relief, of drawing up, entering, and enrolling decrees, and of proceeding before trustees appointed by the court, and generally to regulate the whole practice to be used in courts of equity or admiralty by the circuit and district courts.

SEC. 913. The forms of mesne process and the forms and modes of proceeding in suits of equity and of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in the circuit and district courts shall be according to the principles, rules, and usages which belong to courts of equity and of admiralty, respectively, except when it is otherwise provided by statute or by rules of court made in pursuance thereof; but the same shall be subject to alteration and addition by the said courts, respectively, and to regulation by the Supreme Court, by rules prescribed, from time to time, to any circuit or district court, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States.

The pleadings, practice, and writs employed in the trial of cases on the law docket of the Federal courts is the same as that in the State courts of the State wherein the Federal court is sitting, except where expressly changed by Federal statute. This is so because of an express provision of an act of Congress that it shall be so. The practice in equity cases in the Federal court is the same in all the States, because Congress has so provided in the direction given to the Supreme Court to prescribe the rules which shall govern in such cases. At an early day, the Supreme Court, in execution of this statutory authority, formulated a number of rules which provided a system of procedure substantially similar to that which prevailed in the high court of chancery in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. In addition to the several rules covering particular features of the practice and procedure, the court adopted rule 90, indicating the source from which additional rules of procedure might be adopted and applied in the event a case should arise which was not covered by the provisions of any existing rule. Rule 90 of the Rules of Practice for the Equity Courts of the United States is as follows:

> In all cases where the rules prescribed by this court or by the circuit court do not apply, the practice of the circuit court shall be regulated by the present practice of the high court of chancery in England, so far as the same may reasonably be applied consistently with the local circumstances and local conveniences of the district where the court is held, not as positive rules, but as furnishing just analogies to regulate the practice.

The whole matter, therefore, of providing a system of pleading, practice, and procedure for the Federal courts is regulated by statute, directly or indirectly. That this is so has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, and made the basis of its action when its judgment has been invoked in cases that involved the matter. There is no intimation anywhere in any of the cases to be found in the books that in the matter of processes to be employed the court itself acts, or permits the inferior courts subject to its supervision to act, in the exercise of any pretended inherent power to frame remedies independent of the action of Congress, simply because by so doing they might thereby more effectively protect the rights of persons who come into the courts for their vindication. Instances are to be found where the most meritorious writs and proceedings in the entire field of jurisprudence have been refused in cases that obviously called for a remedy, for the sole reason that Congress had not authorized the courts to employ them. It was true in the case of a writ of habeas corpus and in the most useful proceeding of mandamus. The court has not only insisted that there shall be statutory authority for every step that it takes, but it has not treated the legislation of Congress under that latitudinous rule of construction which would permit it to seize upon general phrases in the statute to include thereunder matters resting on the same reason as those mentioned. The construction has been rather strict than otherwise, and under this rule the court has limited the right of Federal courts to issue the writs of mandamus and other writs to such instances as they may be so employed in aid of a jurisdiction expressly conferred, and not to an unlimited extent as independent remedies. As indicating somewhat the extent to which the courts have gone in this direction, I will read here extracts taken from a number of the opinions of the Supreme Court.

SUPREME COURT RECOGNIZES CONTROL OF CONGRESS.

In Livingston v. Story (9 Pet., 656), it is said:

> That Congress has the power to establish circuit and district courts in any and all of the States, and confer on them equitable jurisdiction in cases coming within the Constitution can not admit of doubt. It falls within the express words of the Constitution. "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." (Art. 3.) And that the power to ordain and establish carries with it the power to prescribe and regulate the modes of proceedings in such courts admits of as little doubt.

In speaking of the obligation assumed by sureties on injunction bond, the Supreme Court in Bein v. Heath (12 How., 178) says:

> Now, there is manifest error in subjecting parties to an injunction bond, given in a proceeding in equity in a court of the United States, to the laws of the State. The proceeding in a circuit court of the United States in equity is regulated by the laws of Congress and the rules of this court made under the authority of an act of Congress.

In United States v. Howland (4 Wheat., 113) the court says:

> And as the courts of the Union have a chancery jurisdiction in every State and the judiciary act confers the the same chancery powers on all, and gives the same rule of decision, its jurisdiction in Massachusetts must be the same as in other States.

In Ames v. Kansas (111 U. S., 472) the court says:

> The judicial power of the United States exists under the Constitution, and Congress alone is authorized to distribute that power among courts.

In Boyla v. Zacharie (6 Pet., 657) the court says:

> And the settled doctrine of this court is that the remedies in equity are to be administered, not according to the State practice, but according to the practice of equity in the parent country as contradistinguished from that of courts of law, subject, of course, to the provisions of the acts of Congress and to such alterations and rules as, in the exercise of the powers delegated by those acts, the courts of the United States may from time to time prescribe. (Robinson v. Campbell, 3 Wheat., 212; U. S. v. Howland, 4 ibid., 108.) So that, in this view of the matter, the effect of the injunction granted by the circuit court was to be decided by the general principles of courts of equity and not by any peculiar statute enactments of the State of Maryland.

In Bath County v. Amy (13 Wall., 244) the court says:

> Were there nothing more in the judiciary act than the grant of general authority to take cognizance of all suits at common law and in equity it might well be doubted whether it was intended to confer the extraordinary power residing in the British court of King's bench to issue prerogative writs. All doubts upon this subject, however, are set at rest by the fourteenth section of the same act, which enacted that circuit courts shall have power to issue writs of scire facias and habeas corpus and all other writs not specifically provided for by statute which may be necessary for the exercise of their respective jurisdictions and agreeable to the usages and principles of law. Among those other writs no doubt mandamus is included; and this special provision indicates that the power to grant such writs generally was not understood to be granted by the eleventh section, which conferred only to a limited extent upon the circuit courts the judicial power existing in the Government under the Constitution. Power to issue such writs is granted by the fourteenth section, but with the restriction that they shall be necessary to the exercise of the jurisdiction given. Why this grant if it had been previously made in the eleventh section? The limitation only was needed.

The Senator from Wisconsin, when he last addressed the Senate, sought to draw a distinction between the writs of habeas corpus and mandamus and the writ of preliminary injunction, by saying that the former, in Great Britain, were treated as high prerogative writs, whereas the writ of injunction was a judicial writ, entirely subject to control by the courts of equity, and not in any wise subject to be dealt with by the legislature in a way that any judge authorized to issue the same would deem to be an abridgment of his right. The judge who wrote the opinion in Bath County v. Amy said that at one time there was some doubt as to whether or not a general grant of jurisdiction to the Federal courts would carry with it the power to take jurisdiction of such proceedings as mandamus, but he also added that all doubt on that subject had been put at rest by the passage of the judiciary act of 1789, by the section as quoted above. He said that after the passage of that act all writs enumerated in the section or included in its provision should be dealt with in the same way. If these writs are to be dealt with in the same way and Congress has authority to abolish the use of the writ of mandamus in any case it may see proper, no reason is perceived why a similar right should not be exercised with reference to the writ of injunction. There is no distinction made in the Constitution of the United States between the rights, power, and authority of courts of equity and courts of law. It invests the courts with jurisdiction to hear and dispose of all cases of law or equity arising under the laws of the United States or belonging to certain other enumerated classes. But it will serve no really useful purpose to consume more time in attempting to show that Congress can rightfully deny the right to resort to the writ of preliminary injunction in any instance that, in its judgment, such a course should be adopted. The power of Congress to do so has not heretofore been denied, but, on the contrary, it has been exercised in three conspicuous instances, and the statutes by which the same has been done have been recognized and enforced by the Supreme Court of the United States without question or discussion as to policy or validity. In every instance where parties have relied upon the statute as a means of preventing an adversary from resorting to the remedy by injunction, the court has gone no further into the question than to determine whether or not the case made is one of those condemned by the statute denying the injunction. When this condition has been ascertained to exist, the court has invariably said in plain terms that the statute controls, and it was accordingly followed and made the rule of action in that particular case. There was no pretense made in any of the opinions in which it came under review that in the passage of the statute Congress had simply reenacted rules that were otherwise the law. It was treated simply as a case where the rule ita lex scripta est applies.

In order that the Senate may understand the scope and character of my contention in this behalf, I will now direct attention, in consecutive order, to the three instances to be found in our statutes where Congress has prohibited the courts from issuing the writ of injunction:

I call attention first to section 720 of the Revised Statutes, being a provision contained in the judiciary act of 1789. The section is as follows:

PROCEEDINGS IN STATE COURTS SHALL NOT BE ENJOINED.

> SEC. 720. The writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except in cases where such injunction may be authorized by any law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy.

The statute has served a very useful purpose in promoting harmony of administration in the peculiar system of government under which we live. The anomalous situation of having courts equal in authority and deriving their powers from different sovereignties, administering justice in the same locality and among the same people, afforded a fruitful source of strife, or at least the opportunity for it, by the inspired ingenuity which at times characterizes the legal profession in designing ways and means by which the law's delays are made no less. The Senator from Wisconsin, when he addressed the Senate on March 23, 1906, in referring to this statute and the reasons which prompted Congress to enact it, said:

> There were good reasons and strong reasons, peculiar to our form of government, which led Congress of that day to prohibit injunctions to restrain proceedings in State courts, for we have States.

It is no argument against the power of Congress to do a particular thing to say that good reasons and strong reasons should exist before the power is exercised. Good reasons and strong reasons ought to exist in support of any exercise of legislative authority by Congress at this late day, and especially should this be true when we come to curtail the power of a chancery court to issue a writ of preliminary injunction—a right of very ancient origin and usually of salutary effect. The reasons why I think the right to prohibit issuing preliminary injunctions should be still further exercised in this case is because I believe that the reasons which support our contention are not only strong reasons and good reasons, but they are stronger reasons and better reasons than exist in support of the enactment of section 720. But I think the consideration of this question has been taken out of the domain of debatable propositions by the action of the Supreme Court of the United States in the manner in which it has dealt with the several acts of Congress limiting the powers of the Federal judiciary in issuing injunctions by the numerous decisions rendered in controversies where such statutes were involved, and the explicit and decisive acceptance of the provisions thereof as the basis of decision. Among lawyers, where a practice or a principle is recognized and applied without question, in controversies, and among litigants, where objection to its validity should be urged by those interested, with a view of having these objections recognized or repudiated by the court, and this is not done, it is assumed that it was omitted because the formative stage of the discussion had been passed. I shall call to the attention of the Senate, without commenting on each case, the decisions of the Supreme Court in which this question of the right of Congress to deny the right of the chancery courts to issue the writ of injunction has been under consideration.

A very meritorious case was made in Haines v. Carpenter. It did not involve any actual conflict of jurisdiction. The matter was proceeding in a way that both courts might have gone on without the least inconvenience. Judge Bradley, in writing the opinion reported in 91 U. S., p. 254, says:

> In the first place, the great object of the suit is to enjoin and stop litigation in the State courts, and to bring all the litigated questions before the circuit court. This is one of the things which the Federal courts are expressly prohibited from doing. By the act of March 2, 1793, it was declared that a writ of injunction shall not be granted to stay proceedings in a State court. This prohibition is repeated in section 720 of the Revised Statutes, and extends to all cases except where otherwise provided by the bankrupt law. This objection alone is sufficient ground for sustaining the demurrer to the bill.

In the case of Sargent v. Helton (vol. 115, U. S. Ct. Rep., p. 350) Judge Wood, in writing the opinion, says:

> The circuit court of the United States was therefore—

After having quoted section 720 he continues—

> The circuit court of the United States was therefore deprived of the power—

Not of jurisdiction, but was deprived of the power—

> The circuit court of the United States was therefore deprived of the power, by the section just quoted, to protect the rights of the plaintiff, unless the writ of injunction was authorized by the law relating to proceedings in bankruptcy.

If there is any virtue in the contention that the right to issue injunctions is a part of the judicial power, and is not a simple matter of jurisdiction to be given or withheld by statute, the language of this decision must be deemed an authority against the position assumed by the Senators from Wisconsin and Pennsylvania. The thing of which the court was deprived by the statute was the power to issue the injunction.

In Dial v. Reynolds, in 96 United States, page 340, the same statute came before the court. The judge said:

> There are two objections to these bills: (1) The gravamen of what is desired as to Reynolds is an injunction to prevent his proceeding at law in the State court. Without this, all else is of no account. Any other remedy would be unavailing. Such an injunction, except under the bankrupt act, no court of the United States can grant.

For the simple reason that the statute said they could not grant it.

> With this exception, it is expressly forbidden by law.

The decision is placed squarely and explicitly upon the ground that the courts are expressly prohibited by statute from issuing an injunction in a case of that kind.

In Chapman v. Brewer (114 U. S., 172) it is said:

> It must be held that Congress, in authorizing a suit in equity in a case like the present, has, in order to make the other relief granted completely effective, authorized an injunction, as necessarily incidental and consequent, to prevent further proceedings under the levies already made and new levies under the judgment. But for the supposed inhibitory force of section 720, a court of equity in granting, on the merits, the other relief here granted, would necessarily have power to award the injunction. We think the circuit court was authorized to award it here within the exception in section 720.

That was a case where the court had to find warrant for the issuance of a writ of injunction, and it is said that the exception contained in section 720 affirmatively gave it power to interfere there.

In the case of In re Sawyer (124 U. S., 219), the judge who wrote the opinion says:

> The restraining order of the circuit court was void, because in direct contravention of the peremptory enactment of Congress, that the writ of injunction shall not be granted by any court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State, except when authorized by a bankrupt act.

In the case of the United States v. Parkhurst-Davis Company (176 U. S., 320), Judge Brewer disposes of the question presented by saying:

> Upon these admissions and facts the case comes clearly within the provision of section 720 of the Revised Statutes, to the effect that no writ of injunction shall be granted by a court of the United States to stay proceedings in any court of a State except in matters of bankruptcy.

After quoting from the decision of Judge Bradley in the case of Haines v. Carpenter (91 U. S., 254), he concluded:

> Without stopping to consider any other questions presented by counsel, this is sufficient to sustain the ruling of the circuit court, and the decree is affirmed.

There is not a single intimation in any of the opinions delivered in the cases mentioned that the validity of the restriction laid upon the chancery courts is to be sustained independently of the positive command of the statute, on the ground that the courts would refrain from issuing injunctions in such cases even in the absence of a statute, in pursuance of the well-known rule of comity which prevents courts of concurrent and equal authority from interfering each with the jurisdiction of the other. The provision is comprehensive, and its inhibitory effect is operative against any injunction issued by the Federal courts against instituting or maintaining litigation in the State courts. An anxious desire to avoid friction between the courts is, therefore, not the only consideration which prompted the enactment of the law. It is a fact within the knowledge of all lawyers that where actual friction exists by reason of the Federal court having first taken cognizance of the controversy which brings about the litigation, it will protect the prior pendency by enjoining the parties from instituting conflicting proceedings in the State court. An instance where this was done is furnished in the well-known case of the Railway Company v. Julian, reported in 193 United States, and heretofore given a prominent place in the discussion conducted by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. The statute applies to many cases, and has been enforced in many cases where no conflict of jurisdiction was possible. In its last analysis it is a mere exercise of the legislative power to limit the remedies administered in courts of equity, and the processes by which those remedies are made effective.

As a second instance where Congress has exercised the right to deny to the chancery court the power to issue a writ of injunction I call attention to section 3224 of the Revised Statutes, which is as follows:

> SEC. 3224. No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court.
> FEDERAL TAXES SHALL NOT BE ENJOINED.

This statute was enacted May 27, 1872.

For eighty years of our history the Government was able to lay and collect taxes without finding it necessary to impose this restraint upon the courts, but in 1872 a condition became manifest which convinced Congress that it would be a wise exercise of its prerogative to take away from the courts of chancery the power to issue injunctions of this kind. The Senator from Wisconsin says that the right to issue an injunction or institute any other form of suit against the Government is a matter of grace, and that in extending permission to sue, it is competent for the sovereign to grant a qualified right or to deny entirely the right to sue; that it is of the highest importance to the sovereign that the taxes laid shall be collected, and that interference by the courts with such collection is not to be tolerated. He therefore argues that Congress could, by omitting to grant affirmative authority to bring a suit on any terms, and could thereby deprive the taxpayer of all judicial remedy to litigate the validity of a tax; that what was done in the passage of section 3224 was really to enlarge the taxpayer's remedy by permitting him to apply in the first instance to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the return of the taxes exacted illegally from him, and in default of prompt action by the Commissioner be permitted to bring a suit at law. This contention is plausable, and it doubtless represents the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin as to the reason why existing legislation was enacted. Admit all this, and it does not militate against the contention we are now making, that Congress has the power to judge for itself when and to what extent the right to issue a writ of injunction shall be denied. The inducements to the enactment of this section may be like those that prevailed in the enactment of section 720 in that they constitute good reasons and strong reasons why it should be done, but that Congress had power to pass the statute and that its validity has long been recognized and enforced by the courts is the pivotal fact with which I am now interested.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Shelton v. Platt (139 U. S., 592), indicates the reason why, in its judgment, legislation such as section 3224 was enacted, and it is somewhat different in nature from the opinion entertained by the Senator from Wisconsin. It is as follows:

> Legislation of this character has been called for by the embarrassments resulting from the improvident employment of the writ of injunction in arresting the collection of the public revenue; and, even in its absence, the strong arm of the court of chancery ought not to be interposed in that direction except where resort to that court is grounded upon the settled principles which govern its jurisdiction.

This explanation by the court, made at the time it was, represents the wide opportunities afforded by a survey by that great court of the whole judicial field of the United States, and a familiarity with the recklessness and want of care with which preliminary injunctions are usually issued. Whilst the Government was willing to still permit this practice to continue so far as the interests of private individuals are concerned, it manifested a purpose to provide a better remedy for itself.

This statute came under consideration by the Supreme Court in the case of Snyder v. Marks (109 U. S., 189). A citizen whose property was about to be seized for a tax levied under Federal authority, applied to the court for an injunction to restrain the officer from seizing his property, and sought to escape the force of section 3224 by alleging that the seizure was wholly unauthorized, because the tax was illegal, and in this connection contended that the courts were deprived of the right to issue an injunction only in cases where the tax itself was conceded to be lawful. The Supreme Court denied the validity of that contention, and said:

> The inhibition of section 3224 applied to all assessments of taxes made under color of their offices by internal-revenue officers charged with general jurisdiction of the subject of assessing taxes against tobacco manufacturers. The remedy of a suit to recover for the tax after it is paid is provided by statute, and a suit to restrain its collection is forbidden. The remedy was given as exclusive, and no other remedy can be substituted for it.

It will be noted that the court does not decide that the right to sue to recover back the tax after the citizen's property has been seized and sold to satisfy the illegal tax is an adequate remedy. It simply says that the remedy is exclusive. There is quite a difference between an exclusive remedy and an adequate remedy. This distinction was made by the court understandingly and for the reason that in the light of its own decisions it could not have made the statement that the remedy by action to recover taxes illegally exacted was adequate. In Ogden City v. Armstrong (168 U. S.) the court says, in dealing with this particular question:

> It often happens, however, that the case is such that the person illegally taxed would suffer irremedial damage, or be subjected to vexatious litigation, if he were compelled to resort to his legal remedy alone. For example, if the legal remedy consisted only of an action to recover back the money after it had been collected by distress and sale of the taxpayer's lands, the loss of his freehold by means of a tax sale would be a mischief hard to be remedied. Even the cloud cast upon his title by a tax under which a sale could be made would be a grievance which would entitle him to go into a court of equity for relief.

The decision of the Supreme Court in the celebrated income-tax case, reported as Pollock v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co. (157 U. S., 429), demonstrated moré forcibly than any argument that I can make that the Federal courts regard section 3224 as nothing more than a positive assertion of power by the legislature in restraint of the power of a court to issue an injunction, and that there does not lie at the foundation of the statute a principle which, considered independent of it, is broad enough to do without the statute the things that it requires to be done. In other words, a tender consideration for the revenues of the country and a desire to remit persons to the remedies enacted by statute which deny a resort to the ordinary equity powers of the courts is not an inherent principle or practice of courts of equity, but is conformed to as a submission to positive restraints imposed by the sovereign authority of Congress. In the income-tax case the court entertained a complaint in equity brought by a stockholder against the officers of the trust company, alleging that it was the purpose of those officers to make returns under the income-tax provision of the Wilson bill, and that after making these returns it was their purpose to pay the tax to the officers of the United States Government. It further alleged that this tax was void because the statute which sought to impose it was unconstitutional. Now, here was a case that involved a vast volume of taxation, levied on the wealth of the country, and it would have been a most admirable opportunity for the court to have said that this suit, although nominally between persons who stood in nowise in adversary relations, was really brought for the purpose of interfering with the collection of the public revenue, and, looking through the mere form in which the action was brought, the court could see that its main purpose was such as brought it within the prohibitory effect of section 3224. Instead of doing that, the court proceeded to entertain the suit on the ground that it did not fall within the letter of the statute and that the restraint upon the court was no greater than the terms of the statute specifically imposed. It proceeded to hear the case, and decided that the tax was invalid.

Mr. Justice White, in his dissenting opinion, urges very strongly the contention that the action of the majority of the court was a plain evasion of the statute, because the litigation, although nominally between private persons, was really directed against the authority of the Government to lay and collect the tax. But the majority of the court stood upon the letter of the statute.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Justice Harlan also dissented upon the same ground.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. Justice Harlan also dissented, and for the same reason, among others. But the court disregarded the restraint of the statute for the reason that the case before the court did not fall within the letter of it. It was not technically a suit against any officer who was attempting to collect the tax. Of course, in this collateral way, the trust company elicited the judgment of the court on the validity of the tax.

Mr. SPOONER. That case was decided on the ground that the law was unconstitutional.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. In the early part of the opinion the court lays down the rule and cites several cases which show that the court has the power in certain cases——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is exactly what I am insisting on; that you can not deprive the citizen of the right to resist the tax collector or anybody else in an effort to take from him his property wrongfully. While the court, in the Income Tax case, admitted that an injunction can not be brought against an officer attempting to collect a tax, it allowed the same thing to be done in an indirect way. A suit to restrain the collection of illegal taxes has over and again been held not to be a suit against the sovereignty, but against the officer, on the theory that he is doing something that he is not authorized by law to do, and that he can only represent the sovereignty when acting lawfully in her behalf.

In re Tyler (149 U. S., 190), a case that came up from South Carolina, the court, in speaking of the distinction between suing the State directly and suing an officer thereof who is seeking to perform an illegal act, says:

> The subject was but recently considered in Pennoyer v. McConnaughy (140 U. S., 1), in which Mr. Justice Lamar, delivering the opinion of the court, cites and reviews a large number of cases. The result was correctly stated to be that where a suit is brought against defendants who claim to act as officers of a State and, under color of an unconstitutional statute, commit acts of wrong and injury to the property of the plaintiff to recover money or property in their hands unlawfully taken by them in behalf of the State; or for compensation for damages; or, in a proper case, for an injunction to prevent such wrong and injury; or for a mandamus in a like case to enforce the performance of a plain legal duty, purely ministerial, such suit is not, within the meaning of the amendment, an action against the State.

So I maintain that the restraint of this section is positive and represents the power of Congress to do what it purports to do. The decision in the Income Tax case shows how readily courts take advantage of the cases that lie without the letter of the statute, but are within its spirit, to do the things that they could not do in a case standing upon similar principles, but falling within the letter of the statute. It is the restraint of the statute, and not that of equitable principles, that prevents the courts from enjoining the officers of the National Government whenever a disputed tax is demanded. The court, in Shelton v. Platt, has indicated that it deemed the substituted remedy to be the exclusive remedy to which the taxpayer is entitled, but it does not state that it was an adequate remedy. Nor could the court, as a matter of fact, have made any such declaration. Anybody, lawyer or layman, understands that where a citizen's property is levied upon, taken from his possession, and sold at a sacrifice at a public sale to satisfy an illegal demand made by the Government, which is charged with the duty of protecting his liberty and his property, that it is no adequate redress to send him to an official to receive back the amount of the tax illegally exacted from him, leaving him the loser by the loss and inconvenience of the deprivation of his property.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a word?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. In the Nichols case, which the Senator will find cited, opposite the section 3224 itself, and from which I read the other day, the court puts it entirely on the ground that the Government will permit the collection of its revenues to be interrupted in any way by judicial proceedings; but it prescribes the conditions upon which such suit may be brought.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am aware that the Supreme Court held in that case that the duty of a taxpayer, whose property had been seized to satisfy an illegal tax, was to pay the tax, and then apply to the officer of the Government for its refund. That was his exclusive remedy, but I insist that it was not an adequate remedy, and if the court intended to lay down the doctrine there that motives of high public policy, based upon the prompt collection of the public revenue, were the considerations which induced the court to refrain from interfering where the administrative collection of public revenues were involved, it lost a most admirable opportunity to have applied the doctrine in its perfection when it omitted to do so in the income-tax case, as I should like to say. No matter what the court may have said in the Nichols case, or in any other case, it is an outrage of the grossest character for the Government to authorize its officers to seize a citizen's property to pay a tax that it had no authority to levy, and then to advise him that he may reimburse himself for the loss by applying to certain officials for a return of the amount wrongfully exacted from him, denying to him all remedy to protect his possession and to raise the question of the validity of the seizure in advance of its being taken from him. And, then, after doing all this, an outcry is raised when an attempt is made to restrain courts from interfering with just as important an exercise of public authority in the matter of fixing the taxes upon the transportation interests of the country by a board specially selected and peculiarly well qualified to discharge the service.

I can not quite understand the arbitrary invasion in the one case and the tender solicitude for the interests involved in the other. If Congress can deny to a citizen all remedy to protect his possession when a seizure is made to satisfy an alleged tax, it would seem that such a remedy might be denied in any case without offending against the constitutional provision which provides that his property shall not be taken without due process of law. Under section 3224 the citizen's right in the abstract to defend his possession exists, but all remedy to make this right effective is taken away from him by the enactment of this section, as construed and sustained by the Supreme Court. A less effective remedy is provided, and in a case where the taking may be conceded to be wrongful. The fact that the pretext for the wrongful taking is to make certain the collection of the revenue does not alter the force of the principle. Congress has simply asserted its supreme power to say that as against an invasion of his property rights by an officer assuming to collect a tax, no preventive remedy shall be available to the citizen. This refusal is a mere exercise of power. That is what we contend for here. We justify its exercise here by considerations of wisdom and policy rarely to be found supporting such an appeal.

Mr. SPOONER. In the Income Tax case the situation was peculiar. That was not a suit against the tax collector; that was a suit brought by a stockholder of a corporation to restrain the corporation from voluntarily making returns under the income-tax act.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am perfectly familiar with the facts, the character of relief sought, and the character of relief granted in that case. The allegation was made that the trust company was about to pay the tax. The object of the litigation was to prevent the payment of the tax, and it did prevent it. The statute says that no suit shall be brought against an officer for the purpose of arresting the payment of a tax. They worked out the same result by indirect methods, but they worked it out all the same. I assert again that when Congress denied to the taxpayer whose property was seized to satisfy an illegal tax, the most proper remedy for the protection of his possession, that it went far beyond anything we are now asking to be done. Before the enactment of section 3224 the taxpayer could, without infringing the sovereign's immunity from action, obtain an injunction against the officer who was threatening to seize his freehold. The principle upon which this was done is adverted to briefly in the extract that I gave a few minutes since in the case of In re Tyler (149 U. S.). The right to challenge the validity of taxes in this way is a matter of every-day occurrence, so far as State taxes are concerned, and there is scarcely a volume of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States for the past twenty years that does not contain a case where such a suit was maintained as not being a suit against the State. A similar objection was presented when the railroad commission cases began to make their appearance in the litigation of the country. It was urged in the Reagan case, in 154 United States. The court made the same disposition of it that had been done in the tax cases, justifying its action in so doing upon the broad proposition that a citizen had a right to protect not only the title to his property, but its possession. The distinction between an officer doing an illegal act and an officer doing a legal act was pointed out and maintained.

STATE COURT SHALL NOT ENJOIN NATIONAL BANK.

I now desire to call to the attention of the Senate the third instance in which Congress has denied to a court the right to issue a preliminary injunction, and in doing so I read part of section 5242 of the Revised Statutes. It is as follows:

SEC. 5242. * * * And no attachment, injunction, or execution shall be issued against such association (national bank) or its property before final judgment in any suit, action, or proceeding in any State, county, or municipal court.

The validity of this statute was established in the case of the Pacific National Bank v. Mixer (124 U. S., 721). The legality of an attachment issued by a State court against a national bank was the particular question submitted for adjudication, but as the statute which prohibited both attachment and preliminary injunction is the same, what was said by the court in disposing of the matter directly before it is applicable to the validity of the entire statute. The court held that the prohibition, in so far as the attachment was concerned, not only disabled the State court from issuing an attachment, but that by reason of the fact that attachments in the Federal courts are authorized only in cases provided for in State statutes, for the reason that the practice and procedure in the trial of law cases in Federal courts is the same as that which prevails in the State where the Federal court is sitting, it was held that as the Federal statute in effect so amended the State statute as to disable the State courts from issuing an attachment against the national banks, it took away from the Federal court the right to issue such an attachment. The court said that section 3224 likewise deprived the State courts of the power to issue injunctions. This the court expressly declared when it said:

It was further said that if the power of issuing attachments has been taken away from the State courts, so also is the power of issuing injunctions. This is true.

Now, if the right to issue a preliminary injunction pertains to the judicial power and is not a mere process, it will puzzle the wit of a wiser man than I am to know how it can be taken away from the State court by an act of Congress and that the same Congress can not take it away from a court created by it. It will not be maintained, and the contention sustained by sound principle or decisive authority, that Congress can take away from the State courts anything that it could not take away from the Federal courts.

I am aware that it is said that Congress could deprive the State courts entirely of the right to try a suit against a corporation created by national authority by simply providing an easy method of removal to the Federal courts. The Congress of the United States can enlarge the jurisdiction of the Federal courts so as to bring within it any class of cases described in the constitutional provision indicating extent to which jurisdiction can be conferred on Federal courts, but it has not seen proper to do so. On the contrary, Congress has conferred exclusive jurisdiction on the State courts in all cases by and against national banks where the sum or matter in dispute is of less value than $2,000, and in all cases it has placed such associations upon the same footing with corporations created by the State in which the bank is located and doing business. But it has denied to the courts the right to extend to litigants generally, and without exception or qualification, the right to have the benefit of the wholesome remedy of preliminary injunction. Some days since, in answer to a suggestion of the senior Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Wisconsin instanced a case of excessive hardship, when he said that it would be a perversion of justice to deny to a citizen, whose negotiable promissory note had been obtained through fraud, the right to seize that note in the hand of a wrongdoer before he had indorsed the same to an innocent holder and had thereby rendered absolute the liability of the maker. Now, this very thing can occur at the present day, if the holder of the note happens to be a national bank. The whole thing illustrates as strongly as any circumstances can that the right to deny the use of the process of preliminary injunction is a legislative matter and can be applied or withheld, according to the legislative judgment or whim. This statute came before the Supreme Court of the United States in a very recent case, that of Van Reed v. People's National Bank (198 U. S., 554). Its validity was affirmed, and the purpose of the court to enforce it was emphasized.

Judge Day, who delivered the opinion in the case, says that it is not only not affected by repeal or otherwise by any subsequent statute, but that it has been generally accepted and followed as the authoritative law by the courts of last resort of many of the States and by the inferior Federal courts. He cites cases wherein the validity of the statute has been affirmed and recognized from Massachusetts, Georgia, Minnesota, and Tennessee. The effect of this decision is to show that Congress has the power to take away from the court which is invested with exclusive jurisdiction of a large class of lawsuits the right to issue preliminary process either in the form of an attachment or preliminary injunction. It is a sheer exercise of power by Congress, which no judge or lawyer concerned in these cases ever questioned or denied.

It is altogether probable that the delicacy of the situation presented when the Supreme Court was called upon to consider the validity of a Congressional statute, taking away from a State court a part of its power, would have prompted the court on its own motion to have first determined the power of Congress to do such a thing.

INJUNCTION AN IMPORTANT PROCESS, BUT IS SUBJECT TO CONTROL BY CONGRESS.

The nature of the case raised the inquiry, and the character of the decision made shows that it was disposed of in favor of the power of Congress. I am greatly encouraged to assume with some confidence that in view of the fact that Congress has denied the right to resort to injunction proceedings in these three notable instances, and that its action in doing so has been so uniformly and emphatically sustained by the United States Supreme Court, that there is no longer any reason for saying that the authority in Congress does not exist. Its exercise in any given case is of course to be controlled by considerations of wisdom and policy. It is not to be arbitrarily done, nor done for the asking. The remedy by injunction is the outgrowth of the paramount obligation that rests upon courts to do justice, and the wholesome character of its aid in this direction vindicates its right to exist. I am not to be included in the number who would sacrifice it as a concession to the idle fear that some judge, into whose hands shall be committed the right to grant it, may abuse the power thus conferred upon him.

Notwithstanding I do not underestimate its importance as an agency in advancing the cause of justice, I believe there are instances where Congress should exercise its discretion to deny a resort to it.

The whole business of administering justice is confessedly imperfect. There are many instances where perfect justice is meted out, but there are many more where something short of a complete remedy is extended. This grows out of the fallibility and imperfection of human judgment and of the sagacity and industry of the wrongdoer. In this matter of making rates we take unusual care to provide for the employment of the very fairest class of men that can be found. A salary of $10,000 a year is provided, and a term of seven year duration is fixed. This ought to secure the service of persons as well qualified to understand the problems that are submitted for their consideration as a lesser salary will secure for service in the judicial branch of the Government. The membership of the Commission is fixed at seven, and they are supplied with all of the accessories necessary to complete mastery of the problems involved in the controversies submitted to them before they are called upon to decide. Any resort to the court to correct their work does not partake of the nature of an application to redress a wrong tortiously inflicted by a wrongdoer, but is rather in the nature of a plea for a second hearing of the questions which we must assume have been carefully and conscientiously decided by the Commission. My support of the proposition to deny the writ of preliminary injunction is therefore predicated upon the belief that the judicial investigation will be no more than a second hearing of a matter that has already been carefully and honestly considered. I believe that it would best effectuate the policy that lies behind this movement to invest the Interstate Commerce Commission with rate making power, to impose upon them such responsibilities as will sober their judgment and make them aware of the care and diligence with which they should discharge their duties. If the unlimited right of injunction is permitted, the Commission will inevitably assume that what they do is of a merely tentative character, and will become operative only when it meets the approval of the court. The railroad companies themselves will not fully develop before the Commission all of the testimony and arguments which make in favor of their own case, knowing that in the light of former experience they can make a very plausible appeal to the court, based upon the fact that what the court is asked to do is not to reverse the Commission, but to consider new developments which have been brought into the lawsuit, and which were not before the Commission.

I now repeat what I said a short time since. I do pretend that because Congress can constitutionally exercise a certain power therefore it should do so. The writ of injunction, both in its preliminary and permanent form, is a remedy of great and demonstrated efficiency, and it should not be dispensed with, in any case, except for reasons of the most convincing character. That these exist in this case I am persuaded beyond the necessity for further argument. I limit my insistence on this occasion, as I would do on every other application that is made to curtail the scope and effect of the writ of injunction, to the facts and circumstances that bear directly on this particular effort to circumscribe its use. I shall therefore proceed to enumerate briefly, without attempting to elaborate, the reasons which occur to me as justifying the adoption of the proposed amendment denying to the courts the right to issue a preliminary injunction to suspend the operation of the order of the Commission pending the final decree in the circuit court. These reasons are not of my own invention, but are based exclusively upon the peculiar nature of the official action to be assailed and on the principles and practices of the law, as these have been developed in the decision of kindred questions by the court of last resort.

Assuming power to deny right to issue preliminary injunction, six reasons why it should be done in this case:

FIRST. ISSUE OF WRIT IS WHOLLY DISCRETIONARY.

In the first place, the issue of a preliminary injunction is a matter that rests solely in the discretion of the judge to whom the application is made. Now, the principal argument made in opposition to the pending amendment is that when a constitutional right is threatened with invasion that the privilege of invoking a preliminary injunction for its protection is necessary to constitute due process of law, and that the denial of the writ in any case destroys the right indirectly by denying the proper remedy for its enforcement. I may say, in passing, that I do not concede that any more sacredness attaches to a right created by the Constitution than to one created by statute or in any other lawful way. The constitutional right has the one advantage that it is secured by a law that is not subject to legislative change. It is a lawful right, no more and no less. The scope and effect of it is the same as if it were created by a valid statute, and the remedies for its enforcement should be no greater or less. Judge Miller, in his dissenting opinion in Gelpoke v. Dubuque (1 Wall., 214), said on this subject:

> Where the construction of a constitution is brought to bear upon the question of property or no property, contract or no contract, I see no sound reason for any difference in the rules for determining the question.

But be that as it may, it is perfectly obvious that a remedy which may be given or withheld at the mere option of the judge to whom application is made is not the kind of a remedy that may be spoken of as part of a vested right. Rights are protected by positive remedies that the litigant is permitted to invoke as a matter of right, and that the court must grant as a matter of duty when proper proof is presented. Even if it were true that every right implies a remedy for its enforcement, and that the Congress has no discretion to prescribe the character of this remedy, the argument would not apply where the so-called remedy can be afforded or withheld at the whim or caprice of the judge, and his action in doing so will not partake of the judicial character to the extent that will warrant the appellate court in reviewing and reversing his actions if it appear that the discretion has been abused. This has in terms been decided by the Supreme Court, as will appear from the citations which I append.

In the case of Buffington v. Harvey (95 U. S., 100) it is said:

> The granting of a rehearing is always within the sound discretion of the court, and therefore granting or refusing it furnishes no ground for appeal. (Steines v. Franklin County, 14 Wall., 15.) The granting or dissolution of a temporary injunction stands on the same footing. The granting of a permanent injunction is part of the same decree and abides the fate of the decree itself.

In our practice there is, in point of fact, no such thing as a permanent injunction. It is included in the decree and becomes a part of the decree. It is called a permanent injunction because it gives injunctive relief.

In Russell v. Farley (105 U. S., 438) it is said:

It is a settled rule of the court of chancery, in acting on applications for injunctions, to regard the comparative injury which would be sustained by the defendant, if an injunction were granted, and by the complainant, if it were refused. (Kerr on Injunctions, 209, 210.) And if the legal right is doubtful, either in point of law or of fact, the court is always reluctant to take a course which may result in material injury to either party, for the damage arising from the act of the court itself is damnum absque injuria, for which there is no redress except a decree for the costs of the suit, or, in a proper case, an action for malicious prosecution. To remedy this difficulty, the court, in the exercise of its discretion, frequently resorts to the expedient of imposing terms and conditions upon the party at whose instance it proposes to act. The power to impose such conditions is founded upon, and arises from, the discretion which the court has in such cases, to grant or not to grant the injunction applied for. It is a power inherent in the court, as a court of equity, and has been exercised from time immemorial.

SECOND. IT ASSAILS JUDGMENT OF SPECIAL TRIBUNAL.

The second reason which should impel Congress to deny the right to suspend the orders of the Commission in advance of demonstrated invalidity is that the application is in its nature a collateral attack on the judgment of a special tribunal, created by law to determine a given state of facts. The rule in such cases is that the determination of the tribunal is to be respected as the decision and judgment of a special court, and its findings are to set aside only when it is made apparent that the erroneous character of its action is so pronounced as to raise a presumption that it acted fraudulently. This rule has been declared in cases where a single person constituted the tribunal, and in a notable case where three persons constituted that tribunal, and in many cases where the tribunal was composed of persons who were vested with authority to act very largely upon their own judgment, informed by such investigation as to matters of fact as they might see proper to institute on their own motion. The plan upon which the Interstate Commerce Commission is to be organized will invest it with a dignity and confer upon it authority that should exclude the possibility of mere wrongdoing and minimize the probabilities of gross error. The round salary and long term will attract men of the first order of ability and character, and the liberal provisions made for supplying the accessories of counsel and masters at least puts into its hands the means of acquiring full and reliable information. That the President will make judicious selections of its membership and that the Senate will act with fairness and independence in confirming their appointment is a presumption that ought to be indulged. If, however, there is no ground for assuming that a commission so selected can be trusted to deal with the subject-matter committed to it in a way that will entitle its completed work to be respected until it is shown, on issue joined, to be wrong to an extent that honest men will not differ about its being so—and that is the rule of invalidity laid down by the Supreme Court in dealing with similar questions—then this furnishes a good reason why the Commission should not be created at all. A commission constituted as this one should be ought to be able to discharge its duties in such a way as to command respect until error is affirmatively shown.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator think that for these very reasons a court would be very slow indeed to issue a preliminary injunction against rates fixed by such a commission?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have not any information derived from my experience and observation that justifies me in saying that courts are under any circumstances very slow to issue injunctions where large interests are involved. I think they are very swift.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not think that general answer is an answer to my question. Whether they are swift or not, they sometimes can not be, as we all know, too swift. But the Senator gave some excellent reasons why a rate fixed after wide investigation and mature deliberation by a commission would be very likely to be a correct rate. Does not the Senator think that as a practical matter a court would be very slow indeed to suspend that rate by a preliminary injunction?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would not have any reason for saying so, based on my experience with the books and from actual observation. I think the first requisite of a railroad lawyer is to be able to draw offhand a bill of complaint showing that any law or official action interfering with the plans of the carrier invades its constitutional rights. If he can not do that, they would not have him around as an office boy.

In commenting on the respect due to the findings of a special tribunal, Judge Brewer, in delivering the opinion in Pittsburg, etc., Company v. Backus (154 U. S., 434), says:

Whenever a question of fact is thus submitted to the determination of a special tribunal, its decision creates something more than a mere presumption of fact, and if such determination comes into inquiry before the courts it can not be overthrown by evidence going only to show that the fact was otherwise than as so found and determined. Here the question determined by the State board was the value of certain property.

Just as here they determine the value of certain service.

That determination can not be overthrown by the testimony of two or three witnesses that the valuation was other than that fixed by the board.

The board had increased the valuation from $8,000,000 to $22,000,000.

It is true such testimony may be competent, and was received in this case because, taken in conjunction with other testimony, it might establish fraudulent conduct on the part of the board sufficient to vitiate its determination. It is not, however, contended by counsel that there was any actual fraud on the part of that board.

The same doctrine was declared in the United States v. California Land Company (148 U. S., p. 43).

Also in the case of French v. Fyan (93 U. S., 170).

So it is plain that we are not dealing with a situation where the right of an individual has been tortiously invaded, or deemed to be tortiously invaded, by another, but we are protecting from inconsiderate assault the completed work of a very carefully organized Commission, composed of able and conscientious men, and it should have the presumption of verity accorded to it. It ought not to be sent out by the Congress that authorizes its existence with a statutory badge of suspicion of wrongdoing and an invitation to attack.

THIRD. PARTY SEEKING CAN NOT BE COMPELLED TO DO EQUITY.

The third reason why I think Congress is warranted in denying the right to apply for a preliminary injunction is based on the fact that the nature of the litigation deprives the court of the correlative power to so mold its order as to do justice to all parties interested in the litigation. It can not apply its favorite maxim of requiring those who enter its portals to come with clean hands, and, while asking for equity, agree to do equity. The Supreme Court of the United States has fixed the limit of the judicial power to interfere with the orders of a railway commission in the matter of fixing rates at the point of determining whether or not the entire body of rates will yield a sufficient fund to satisfy the carrier's constitutional right to just compensation for the use of its property in the public service of transportation. The court will look to the action of the Commission for this single purpose, and if it finds that it is wanting in ever so small a degree in satisfying the constitutional right to just compensation, it will nullify the entire proceeding of the Commission. The court will not assume to modify the rate by increasing it to a point that will satisfy the carrier's constitutional right. On the other hand, it may affirmatively appear that the rate fixed by the carrier is in excess of what it should be, and yet the court is without power to require the abatement of any part of it pending a final disposition of the case. This feature is not involved in the litigation. The litigation concerns the validity of the Commission's order. The only thing the court can do is to condemn the Commission's rate entirely or permit it to stand as a whole. The court has no power of apportionment. The principal consideration which makes the right to issue a preliminary injunction tolerable and equitable is the power of the chancellor to impose terms that will come as near protecting the rights of all concerned as human intelligence and conscience will permit, as is manifest from the extract I read a short while ago from Russell v. Farley (150 U. S.). For the purpose of showing the extent and character of the relief granted by the court in these railroad-commission cases when the validity of a rate-making order is called in question, I read from Judge Brewer's opinion in Reagan v. Trust Company (154 U. S.):

It is doubtless true, as a general proposition, that the formation of a tariff of charges for the transportation by a common carrier of persons or property is a legislative or administrative rather than a judicial function. Yet it has always been recognized that, if a carrier attempted to charge a shipper an unreasonable sum, the courts had jurisdiction to inquire into that matter and to award to the shipper any amount exacted from him in excess of a reasonable rate; and also in a reverse case to render judgment in favor of the carrier for the amount found to be a reasonable charge. The province of the courts is not changed nor the limit of judicial inquiry altered because the legislature, instead of the carrier, prescribes the rates. The courts are not authorized to reverse or change the body of rates imposed by a legislature or a commission; they do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or what under all circumstances would be fair and reasonable as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work; but still there can be no doubt of their power and duty to inquire whether a body of rates prescribed by a legislature or a commission is unjust and unreasonable, and such as to work a practical destruction to rights of preporty, and if found so to be, to restrain its operation.

* * * * * * *

The challenge in this case is of the tariff as a whole, and not of any particular rate upon any single class of goods. As we have seen, it is not the function of the courts to establish a schedule of rates. It is not, therefore, within our power to prepare a new schedule or rearrange this. Our inquiry is limited to the effect of the tariff as a whole, including therein the rates prescribed for all the several classes of goods, and the decree must either condemn or sustain this act of quasi legislation. If a law be adjudged invalid, the court may not in the decree attempt to enact a law upon the same subject which shall be obnoxious to no legal objection. It stops with simply passing its judgment on the validity of the act before it. The same rule obtains in a case like this.

I also read from the opinion in Pittsburg Railway Company v. Board of Public Works (172 U. S.):

One of the reasons why a court should not thus interfere as it would in any transaction between individuals is that it has no power to apportion the tax or to make a new assessment, or to direct another to be made by the proper officers of the State. These officers, and the manner in which they shall exercise their functions, are wholly beyond the power of the court when so acting. The levy of taxes is not a judicial function. Its exercise, by the constitutions of all the States and by the theory of our English origin, is exclusively legislative. A court of equity is, therefore, hampered in the exercise of its jurisdiction by the necessity of enjoining the tax complained of, in whole or in part, without any power of doing complete justice by making, or causing to be made, a new assessment on any principle it may decide to be the right one. In this manner it may, by enjoining the levy, enable the complainant to escape wholly the tax for the period of time complained of, though it be obvious that he ought to pay a tax if imposed in the proper manner.

It is an inflexible rule of equity jurisprudence that unless the court can see that it can render a decree that will afford to all parties in interest complete justice it will decline to interpose at all, leaving the parties to such remedies as may be afforded by other courts. Applying that principle here, the court ought not to grant a preliminary injunction in cases of this kind, because by doing so the excessive rates charged by the carrier must be the measure of the shipper's liability pending the litigation, notwithstanding it may on final hearing turn out that the Commission rate was lawfully made.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator any doubt of the power of a court granting a preliminary injunction in a case where it is apparent to the court that it should be granted to prevent irremediable loss to grant it upon terms to be fixed by the court?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think the court could grant a preliminary injunction on any terms that will be consistent with the relief it could include in its final decree.

Mr. SPOONER. Could not a court require every dollar of money collected by the railway company under the order representing the difference between the rate fixed by the Commission and the rate collected to be deposited in the court to await the final result?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. You mean to appoint a collector to do that?

Mr. SPOONER. To require the party to pay into the court every dollar collected in excess of the rate fixed by the Commission, to be held in the registry of the court, subject to the order of the court to abide the result of the litigation?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. As a mere abstract question of power the court might make such an order, but it would be attended by so many practical difficulties I am quite satisfied the court would never undertake to do the collecting and reporting.

Mr. SPOONER. Could not the court require the carrier to present with each payment the name of the person from whom collected and the point from which it was collected?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I suppose it could appoint an auditor or collector to stand at every station door and collect the money, but the courts have not done that in the case of ordinary taxation.

Mr. SPOONER. The court is not impotent in such respects.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is fettered with so many difficulties that I will say, in a general way, the court will never make such an order, because the integrity of the return depends entirely upon the integrity of the litigant. It puts it in the hands of the litigant to say how much is collected and how much shall be turned over. The court would never know whether the order had been complied with or not. The people who collect the money, the station agents, would report if they saw proper. I do not think any court has ever made an order of that kind where the efficiency and integrity of its enforcement was so completely under the control of the party whose wrongful and oppressive conduct is primarily the cause of the litigation. But, then, such an order as that would not do justice if the court should make it. That would only enrich the shipper at the expense of the consumer and the producer. The real owner of the money never would get it back. It would be better to put it in the Treasury. Then the taxpayers would get the benefit of it, as it would be used for public purposes. There is no justice in returning it to the shipper. He has not, in fact, paid a dollar of it. The shipper has not been damnified in a single cent. The shipper deducts the freight rates he is to pay from the price paid for the product to be carried, or adds it to the price when sold to the consumer.

FOURTH. COURT HAS NO OPPORTUNITY TO MAKE NECESSARY EXAMINATION.

The fourth objection to the justice of allowing a preliminary injunction to issue in cases of this kind is found in the numerous and complicated facts and computations that are to be considered before an intelligent judgment can be arrived at. A preliminary injunction issued without an intelligent and definite knowledge of the scope and effect of the litigation, is a mere matter of guesswork, and this ought never to be tolerated when the judgment of a respected tribunal concerning a public matter is to be made the point of attack. The practical force of this objection will appear more plainly by reference to a case decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, where the decree of the United States circuit court was reversed principally upon the ground that the judge in the lower court had made the computations and findings by his own efforts and without the aid of a master. Judge Brewer, in writing the opinion of the court in the case of the Chicago Railway v. Tompkins (176 U. S., 169), comments on this practice, as follows:

It would doubtless be within the competency of this court on an appeal in equity to do this—

That is, to examine all the testimony—

but we are constrained to think that it would not (particularly in a case like the present) be the proper course to pursue. This is an appellate court, and parties have a right to a determination of the facts in the first instance by the trial court. Doubtless if such determination is challenged on appeal, it becomes our duty to examine the testimony and see if it sustains the findings, but if the facts found are not challenged by either party, then this court need not go beyond its ordinary appellate duty of considering whether such facts justified the decree. We think this is one of those cases in which it is especially important that there should be a full and clear finding of the facts by the trial court. The questions are difficult, the interests are vast, and therefore the aid of the trial court should be had. The writer of this opinion appreciates the difficulties which attend a trial court in a case like this.

In Smyth v. Ames, supra, a similar case, he, as circuit judge presiding in the circuit court of Nebraska, undertook the work of examining the testimony, making computations, and finding the facts. It was very laborious and took several weeks. It was a work which really ought to have been done by a master. Very likely the practice pursued by him induced the trial judge in this case to personally examine the testimony and make the findings. We are all of opinion that a better practice is to refer the testimony to some competent master to make all needed computations and find fully the facts. It is hardly necessary to observe that, in view of the difficulties and importance of such a case, it is imperative that the most competent and reliable master, general or special, should be selected, for it is not a light matter to interfere with the legislation of a State in respect to the prescribing of rates nor a light matter to permit such legislation to wreck large property interests.

We are aware that the findings made by the master may be challenged when presented to the trial judge for consideration, and it may become its duty to examine the testimony to see whether those findings are sustained, as likewise, if sustained by the trial court, it may become our duty to examine the testimony for the same purpose. But before we are called upon to make such examination we think we are entitled to have the benefit of the services of a competent master and an approval of his findings by the trial court. As we have said, those findings may not be challenged by either party, and if so, a large burden will be taken from the appellate court.

For these reasons we not merely reverse the decree of the trial court, but also remand the case to that court with instructions to refer the case to some competent master to report fully the facts, and to proceed upon such report as equity shall require.

Now, if a judge, after considering all the evidence offered by both parties, hearing the arguments of counsel, and having taken weeks to work out a result deliberately, can not render an intelligent final decree, what hope is there that it can do justice upon the partisan allegations of the bill of complaint, supported by ex parte affidavits, and issue a preliminary injunction? If the appellate court will not permit such work to be done in person by a judge in the lower court, who devotes weeks to making the examination and computations necessary to enable him to intelligently render a final decree, on the ground that the service to be performed is such as to require more care and labor than the judge is capable of bestowing, then what foundation is there for saying that he may temporarily grant, with the scant consideration usual in such cases, the same relief that the Supreme Court declares him, unaided, incapable of extending intelligently when he comes to announce his final decree?

The litigation in Railroad v. Tompkins related to a rate fixed by the State commission of South Dakota. The estimated division of the commerce of the country is one-fifth State commerce and four-fifths interstate commerce. If the court felt justified in making the observation it did in connection with a controversy that related to rate making in one of the smaller States of the Union, how much more difficult will the task be when the larger volume of interstate commerce is drawn in question? It is perfectly plain that any examination that a judge can give on the mere application for a preliminary injunction will not carry with it authoritatively that extent and character of intelligent judicial condemnation that should be required to overturn even temporarily the work of the Commission. The deliberate findings of that Commission ought not to be overturned by the partial examination which the court or judge will make when granting a preliminary injunction.

The opinion of the court in the Tompkins case was written by Judge Brewer, who served as United States circuit judge for many years on the largest circuit in the United States, located in the northwestern section of the country, where controversies affecting public carriers were more numerous and more intelligently supported and assailed than in nearly any other section of the Union. In the development and advancement of the law to its present condition, Judge Brewer has not only been a pioneer, but a veteran. He has brought to bear upon that complicated question all the powers of his great intellect and his superb qualities of a farseeing statesman. If the pending bill shall become a law, and shall eventually be the means of applying a remedy to any of the abuses against which it is nominally directed, it will owe much to the formative aid of that courageous and sagacious judge in enforcing the equity of its purpose and spirit, rather than its scant and defective phraseology.

FIFTH. COURT CAN NOT PROTECT REAL PARTY IN INTEREST.

There is a fifth reason why I deem it to be the duty of Congress to prohibit the issue of a preliminary injunction to suspend the order of a Commission, that is as strong in its equities as any that can be mentioned, and if none other existed would be sufficient to justify the denial asked for. It is obvious that if the Commission rate is enjoined pending the trial that the carrier will continue to charge the rate fixed by itself. The shipper of freight is usually a middleman, or mere dealer in commodities that he causes to be transported from one point to another. In some instances he deducts from the price to be paid for products bought by him the freight rate necessary to transport his purchases to the place at which he expects to market them. In instances where the shipper is a jobber or distributer of products, he adds the freight paid to the price of the commodity, and thus fixes the price that the consumer must pay.

If it should turn out that the commission rate was wrongfully enjoined, payment to the shipper would in nine cases out of ten enable him to reap where he had really never sown. The real loser is either the producer or the consumer. These unrepresented classes should be protected if it is possible to do so, and if it seems utterly impracticable to do so, the court should not be allowed to pursue a course where their loss would be inevitable, without any hope of recoupment, directly or indirectly. If it shall turn out that the commission rate is too low, the carrier is not without remedy pending the litigation, since it may bring a practical demonstration of this fact to the notice of the Commission, which body is invested with authority to modify the rates fixed by it; and if in the end it shall turn out that the rate is too low and a deficiency in the income of the revenues of the carrier is thereby produced, it would not be an arbitrary and unwarranted exercise of discretion on the part of the Commission to allow such increase in the rates as would reimburse the carrier for the loss that had been imposed upon it by the action of the Commission itself. This matter of considering the rights of interested and unrepresented parties is a well-known principle in equity jurisprudence. The recent case of Beasley v. The Texas and Pacific Railway Company, 191 U. S., 498, is a case that amply presents this feature. The railway commission of the State of Louisiana had directed the railway company to erect a depot at a certain place 3½ miles distant from an existing station. Persons interested in the existing station sought an injunction against the railway company to prohibit it from complying with the order of the commission. It appeared in the progress of the trial that the railway company was perfectly willing for the injunction to issue, so that, in fact, the nominal parties to the litigation were in agreement as to the outcome desired. In denying the injunction, Judge Holmes said that it was one of the cases where public policy demanded that the rights of the unrepresented should not be ignored, and that the relief should be denied because of the inability of the court to protect their interest otherwise. Judge Holmes said:

> It is objected that the foregoing was not the ground of the demurrer. But, as was observed by the court below, other grounds are open on demurrer ore tenus, and apart from that consideration, if it appears that an injunction would be against public policy, the court properly may refuse to be made an instrument for such a result, whatever the pleadings. The defendant may desire the relief to be granted—

That is, in case the railroad company may desire to be successfully enjoined from building the depot—

> It is suggested that it does. But the very meaning of public policy is the interest of others than the parties, and that interest is not to be at the mercy of the defendant alone.

SIXTH. MOTIVE FOR DELAY REMOVED FROM RAILROAD AND MOTIVE FOR DILIGENCE FURNISHED.

As promptness in decision is secondary only to correctness of decision, there is a sixth ground for denying to the courts the right to issue a preliminary injunction that must not be overlooked nor its importance minimized. The very fact that the Commission's work is to become operative for a time without the scrutiny and support of the court will impress upon the Commission a sense of fairness and conservatism that will be very wholesome. On the other hand, the railroad company, being made aware of the fact that no unfair advantage is to be gained by delaying the final hearing, will be invested with the very strongest motives for accelerating the trial in every possible way. In the first place, the railroad company, knowing that the Commission's rate must become operative for a time, at least, will make a full and frank showing before the Commission, and thereby in many cases obviate the necessity of a resort to court, and this must be so unless we are to assume that the attitude of the Commission is to be habitually antagonistic to the railroad interest and that everything it does is to be dictated by a partisan and oppressive spirit toward the carriers.

The circumstance that the rate will, by very force of the statute, expire and become inoperative in two years is a strong reason why Congress should remove from the carrier all motive for delay, since it is common knowledge among those whose business it is to be familiar with the course of procedure in courts that it is a rare case that can be originated in the circuit court and finally disposed of in the Supreme Court within a period of two years. It is a practical impossibility to do this if either party is anxious to avail himself of the law's delays.

I will now direct the attention of the Senate to what I conceive to be its duty and power in the matter of providing for a judicial review of the action of the Commission in fixing rates under the delegation of power to it for that purpose. I have heard so much in the course of this discussion about a broad review by the courts of the action of the Commission and about a narrow review of its action that I felt interested to ascertain which of these was preferable and what my duty in this connection required me to do. I had a sort of surface impression, in the absence of an examination of the authorities, that as the work of the Commission was done by way of substitution for Congress itself that its action must partake of the immunity from judicial interference that inherently pertains to a legislative act or acts. As a result of such limited and imperfect examination, as all such work done by me must be, I have reached the conclusion, firmly and clearly, that Congress has no real power in connection with the matter. The only judicial feature of a rate-fixing order of the Commission is as to whether or not the constitutional right of the carrier to just compensation for the use of its property has been respected. If the rate fixed affords a revenue that will satisfy this demand, then the courts are without power to interfere. Speaking for myself alone, I would just as soon the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] should write the review provision to be incorporated in this bill, if one is to be so incorporated, as to write it myself. I would not provide for any review, while he would require everything the Commission does, and every phase of its action, to be subjected to the consideration of the courts, and he may logically and consistently do this, since he maintains that this whole business is an infamous proposition.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I know the Senator does not mean to misrepresent me.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Oh, no.

Mr. ALDRICH. I said the proposition to make the decision of the Commission final, without any possible chance to have the rights of the parties litigated or maintained by the courts, was an infamous proposition. I do not understand that the Senator from Arkansas or anybody else at this day is contending for any such proposition.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not contending that I can do it, but I will say that I should like to do so. When you denounce that contention as an infamous proposition you denounce a position assumed and earnestly defended by Justices Bradley, Gray, and Lamar, in the dissenting opinion in the case of Railroad v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 460), for these judges insisted that, under the law, the Commission rate should be entirely free from judicial interference or control.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is from the legal standpoint. I was not discussing it from the legal standpoint, but from the ethical standpoint.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think that if it be true that the President can not select seven railroad commissioners who possess sufficient character and ability to properly discharge the duty of prescribing railway rates without the necessity for submitting its action to the revision of the court for any purpose, other than to protect the constitutional rights of the carrier to just compensation, I should consider the circumstance to be a very strong argument against creating a commission at all.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then, I understand the Senator would be glad to make the decision of a political body upon the question of rates throughout the United States final if he could?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would, in order to do so, constitute the Commission somewhat differently from the Commission proposed in this bill. I would confine their proceedings and power as largely as practicable to that of an organized judicial court and have an entirely distinct bureau to originate and prosecute the partisan aspect of the inquiry. I would invest it with the dignity, power, and responsibility of a court as largely as I could, and keep away from its members all the lobbying influences that frequently infest legislative and administrative bodies.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is promptly running away from the question I asked him. I asked him whether he would be glad to make the decisions of this board, a political board, to be appointed and removed by the President at will, final.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is what lawyers call an abstract question. There is no possibility of it. As the law is established, there is no power in Congress to make the orders of the Commission impervious to judicial assault when the carrier's constitutional right to just compensation is invaded.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator was saying what he would like to do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I should not hesitate to create a commission and invest it with power to finally dispose of this business of rate making. But in doing so, I should select and equip the Commission in such a way as to give to its proceedings and decision such manifest fairness as to relieve these from every criticism that affected their fairness, save such as might arise from errors honestly made. No tribunal composed of merely human beings can escape the possibility of these, nor would I degrade the Commission into a mere figurehead to escape the fear that something of this kind might happen.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator would like to appoint the Commission, I suppose?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Not necessarily so. But if it were my duty to do so, I think I could select a commission that would do justice according to my idea of justice. Any officer competent in character himself, and endowed with sufficient knowledge of men to select judges to review the work of the Commission when completed, ought to be able to select a competent commission. I would not allow any commission to originate complaints and try them, and then make their action final. I would provide a bureau or force of attorneys to originate and prosecute complaints, limiting the power of the Commission to impartial judgment. I would not allow them to be personally approached and solicited by railroad men and subjected to all sorts of lobbying influences, as legislative and administrative bodies sometimes are. I would invest them with the same dignity as our courts and judges, and protect them by a public opinion that will make it improper to deal with them except in the public and fair presentation of matters to be considered by them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then the Senator is not entirely pleased with the proposition to make this Commission prosecutors and judges and executors?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; I am not at all pleased with the bill. I can make a better bill than this, in my humble opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will offer some amendment before the discussion is over.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would offer a new bill, and I would offer one that would effectually put the railroads in the business of hauling freight and passengers through the country, and out of the business of hauling fictitious bonds and watered stock through Wall street. I would confine the carriers to the discharge of their duties as public carriers, in the exercise of powers and rights that they can not enjoy for a single hour without public permission. But I should give them a fair return for doing it; and not only that, but pay them liberally for doing it, and to an extent that would furnish encouragement to build new railroads through Arkansas and all the western country, where others are needed beyond what is now there. I would not grind them down to any petty and precarious return on the real value of the property employed in the service of the public.

Mr. ALDRICH. How much does the Senator think they ought to pay in Arkansas in the way of dividends?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would fix the sum at about 6 per cent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would the Senator make that rule apply to the country at large?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Based on investments?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; on the actual value of the property at the time it is being employed in the service of the public.

Mr. ALDRICH. Without regard to the stocks and bonds outstanding?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not think that the condition of the stock and bond floatation of any railroad has a controlling influence as to what is a just compensation to the carrier for the use of its property by the public. The Supreme Court says that the basis of computation is the value of the property, not the extent of its debts nor the number of its stockholders, at the time the property is so employed, that is to control.

Mr. ALDRICH. I presume the railroads of Arkansas never issued securities improperly?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not making any particular complaint against, nor warfare on, the railroads of Arkansas or the railroads of the country. They are all about alike. I do not attach personal blame to the railroad men of Arkansas or the railroad men of the country for anything they are doing. They are simply doing the things the law permits them to do, and probably as I would do under the same circumstances.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am very glad to hear the liberal views of the Senator from Arkansas as to the amount of dividends to be paid. The average dividend paid in the United States is in the neighborhood of 4 per cent.

BASIS OF ADJUSTING JUST AND REASONABLE RATE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The railroads are capitalized at an average valuation of $63,000 per mile. Official investigations made in three of the leading States, and in which investigation the railways had a right to take part, showed that for $25,000 per mile the railways there could be replaced and put in operation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Twenty-five thousand dollars a mile might build a railroad in Arkansas, but it would not in New York.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am sure the railroads in Arkansas are as well equipped as those anywhere. I see no good reason why $25,000 per mile would not build a railroad anywhere, where the conditions were not exceptional.

Mr. ALDRICH. You have good railroads; but it costs a good deal more for the right of way to build a railroad in the East.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That may be true, but the territory embraced in the calculation is so wide that in reaching an average valuation of $25,000 a mile so many inferior roads are included at that rate without being worth so much that a wide margin remains to make up the deficiency of the estimate when the good ones are considered.

Mr. ALDRICH. A railroad might be built in sparsely settled regions of Arkansas if there were good grades for probably fifteen or twenty thousand dollars a mile, while in the mountain regions of Colorado and in some places in the East where the right of way is extremely expensive $150,000 a mile would be a very moderate sum.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is very true. I have not any doubt that there are a few cases of that kind. I presume, however, that such situations could be fairly adjusted. I would have a system so completely adjustable that justice could be done to every particular enterprise. I would have it understood where the cost of construction was $150,000 a mile that owners should have a fair return upon their expenditure, but I would want to be first advised as to the cost of the railroad and of the fact that the amount had been really invested in the railroad. I would not accept the bond and stock flotations which represent the concreted evidences of the whole system of abuses, of extortion and discrimination practiced upon the public who patronize the railroads, as conclusive evidence that this sum had been so invested. I would deal fairly and liberally with the railroad companies. I do not believe in any parsimonious policy or in the inauguration of unjust warfare against the railroads of the country. We can not get along without them, but we ought to understand how much liberality we are extending to them, and not make them the sole account keepers of the whole business.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very much interested in the Senator's argument, and I wish to ask him if he has thought of any method by which the railroads can be brought down to their actual value?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I should say that can be done just as satisfactorily as you can can estimate just compensation for rights of way and other similar things. Just compensation is a matter of market value; it is very largely a matter of opinion. The Constitution does not actually mean "just compensation," because that is an unknown standard—that is to say, it is a variable standard—it depends upon the judgment of a jury, board, commission, or court that decides the particular case. The witnesses who are called upon to testify, the skill of the lawyer, and many other things enter into it. I have heard of cases where equal undivided interests in the same tract of land have been differently valued by different juries where separate trials were necessary. I should say there was a way of finding that out. If the investigation should be conducted in good faith, I would not undertake to say that every doubt should be resolved against the railroads. In regard to the amount of income or wherever it was doubtful as to what the railroad cost, I would give proper weight to the representations made by the railroad company itself and those who represent it as to its value.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How would the Senator——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How would the Senator from Arkansas reduce this improper overcapitalization? I think every student of this subject concedes that this is perhaps the most critical question in the whole series of questions—this overcapitalization issued and absorbed by the public more or less innocently. I addressed the same question the other day to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as to how this improper overcapitalization, which is absorbed by the innocent public and held by them, can be reduced. That it ought to be reduced I suppose every man will concede; but how does the Senator propose to do that? I think the man who solves that problem will have won for himself fame that will almost amount to immortality.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can get along on a great deal less than that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But how would the Senator reduce it? I am very much interested in that question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would adopt for myself the doctrine of the Supreme Court, that the carrier shall be entitled to a fair compensation on the value of his property used in the service of the public, and at the time it is being so used, and then I should let the overcapitalization take care of itself. I would put upon that part of the public who are patrons of the road a tax that would produce just compensation to the carrier, and base this upon the actual value of the property used, and I would not further tax the patrons to raise an additional fund to enable the companies to declare dividends on watered stock and to pay interest on fictitious bonds. That will be a matter for the carrier, and the so-called "innocent investors" will have to look out for themselves. The rule of caveat emptor applies to these.

WHAT TO DO WITH WATERED STOCKS AND BONDS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I do not wish the Senator to understand that I am in any sense by these questions defending overcapitalization. On the contrary, I am quite in sympathy with the Senator's stand that there should not be any overcapitalization; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that when I also asked the Senator from Wisconsin the other day in regard to it, he made the same answer, and I have thought about it since. If you charge a rate which will produce a proper dividend upon the actual investment, and, as the Senator from Wisconsin the other day stated, let the overcapitalization take care of itself, this income will have to be distributed among the stockholders alike and among all the stock alike, both that which is proper capitalization and that which is overcapitalization. Where, then, would you make the dividing line and pay to the holders of stock who held proper stock a proper dividend and to those who hold watered stock no dividend? I should be very glad to hear the Senator's opinion upon that.

I say again that I am quite in sympathy with the idea that there should not be any overcapitalization nor any dividends, if possible, paid upon a single share of watered stock; but in the distribution of the dividends how will we differentiate the stock which represents a just valuation of the railroad from the stock which represents water?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In the first place, there are very few innocent holders of railroad stock. There may be such holders of railroad bonds.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But suppose there are a thousand stockholders and that one is an innocent holder; while 999 are not innocent holders, you would have to distribute the income among all of them. How would you determine what was watered stock and what portion of the stock represented the exact actual investment?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That would be a matter for each stockholder to determine for himself before he bought the stock, whether or not he was buying stock in an enterprise that had been overcapitalized.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am not talking about the man who bought watered stock, but I am talking about the man who bought stock representing actual value before the watered stock was issued. After the income derived from the operation of the roads is in its treasury and the expenses are paid the excess must be distributed in the form of dividends among the stockholders, unless there is some provision to the contrary in the stock itself.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator describes a condition that very rarely exists, as I think. There may be different series of stocks, where increases and additions are subsequently made after the so-called "innocent stockholders" have purchased shares of the issue whose amount is not open to the criticism of being excessive and fictitious, but these instances are so exceptional that their correction can be looked after by the ordinary courts of justice where remedies against fraud are administered. Certainly the remedy is not by taxing the public to make the scheme profitable. To do so would be to put a premium upon the dishonest manipulation of the finances of the carrier and impose a handicap on the honestly conducted corporation. The larger income would go to the least deserving. Nearly all the corporation laws that I know anything about provide that the stockholders shall be consulted and shall authorize, by a vote of three-fourths or two-thirds, the proposed increase. If any stockholder objects to the issuance of fictitious stock, and the same be issued notwithstanding, he would have his remedy in court. If he let the opportunity pass, then he would have to take his chances along with the others, and his stock would be no better than that of the holders of the more recent issue.

But I say without qualification that, so far as the public is concerned, no matter how innocent he may be in fact of any guilty participation in issuing the fictitious stock, he has no moral or legal right to call upon the public to pay him dividends on his stock simply because he happens to be associated with enterprises that have put upon the market fictitious or watered stock. That is a matter of adjustment between him and the corporation. The public ought to be required to pay and the carrier ought to be authorized to receive only a fair return upon the value of the property that it is using for the time being in the public service. If that sum does not enable the carrier to pay interest on its bonds and dividends on its stock, it is not a matter that concerns the public. They can not call on the shippers and producers of the country to furnish money to make profitable every fraudulent investment in which they may be interested. They have no right to ask that the power of Congress be exerted to insist that the irregularity of their business methods—not to characterize it more strongly—shall be made good. What the public is entitled to is the use of the railroads, and what the railroads are entitled to from the public is a fair and reasonable rate for doing the service. That reasonable rate is a mere matter of adjustment between shippers and the carriers as the law is now, or between the Commission and the court and the carrier as we now propose.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Arkansas is right in his contention, it would be a very simple matter to arrive at a proper basis as to the rates of charge of the railroads of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; I think so.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the railroads of the United States cost $25,000 a mile, and no more than that——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Taken as a whole.

Mr. ALDRICH. And they would be entitled to 6 per cent, which would be $1,500 a mile, it would be easy for the Commission, or somebody else charged with this matter, to ascertain what rate would be required to pay that amount. It is true you would wipe out $8,000,000,000 of securities in the United States in the hands of innocent holders—although the Senator from Arkansas will not agree with me that they are innocent holders—but the Senator would see that justice would be done in that case in Arkansas, if not anywhere else. I think the plan of the Senator from Arkansas is a very simple one, and we do not need to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to ascertain the valuation of the railroads; but we can assume that $25,000 a mile is a proper valuation for the railroads of the United States, and that 6 per cent is a reasonable sum to be paid on that $25,000 a mile, which makes it a very simple proposition. Then, if you should reduce your rate to a rate per ton per mile and take the gross tonnage of those railroads, you could find out what the Pennsylvania road ought to charge, and what every other railroad ought to charge. It would be very easy and simple, according to the Senator's mathematical basis, to fix this whole matter.

ASSUME NOTHING, BUT FIX VALUE IN EACH CASE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from Arkansas is not going to assume anything. I am going to take each railroad company and find out accurately, not by statistics nor by broad generalization that includes the whole 200,000 miles of railroad, but I am going to take each railroad and determine how much it is actually worth, how much its tonnage ought to be taxed to make a 6 per cent return on its actual value. I am not going to take $25,000 a mile as an arbitrary amount, for the reason that that is more than some are worth and it is vastly less than others are worth. I am satisfied in my own mind, from the little investigation I have made, that $25,000 a mile the country over would be an amount of money for which the whole railroad mileage could be reproduced.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not wish to pursue the Senator with this inquiry——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am very glad to hear the Senator. It is an important matter, and one that is involved in this inquiry, and it ought to be talked about.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that, as the Senator from Wisconsin stated the other day, it is by far the greatest problem in this whole great problem, and I want to see if I can not put my question in still more concrete form. The Senator says that he would give to certain investors, representing the actual value of the road, 6 per cent upon their investment, and to other investors, representing watered stock, or representing overvaluation, nothing. How would he determine which stockholders were to get 6 per cent and which were to get nothing?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would pay 6 per cent into the treasury of the railroad company and allow them to distribute it in any lawful way. If they had bonds enough out to require the whole income to pay interest on these, I would first pay to the bondholders the interest.

Mr. ALDRICH. Would the Senator leave that to the Commission?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Commission has nothing to do with the distribution. The Commission simply fixes the rate.

Mr. ALDRICH. I thought, with the Senator's idea of the Commission, especially a political commission, that he would probably be willing to leave it to them.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; I would not be willing to leave anything to them, except the adjustment of the rate and having it reviewed to prevent the invasion of any constitutional right, and then I should make the railroads do the business they contracted to do when they accepted the franchise they exercise. The income of the railroad company will presumably be disbursed to those lawfully entitled to receive it. If it is not voluntarily disbursed to them, the courts are open to enforce the rights of those unjustly deprived of their rights to the fund collected from the public.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very cheerfully.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very much obliged for the Senator's patience. I think the Senator will agree with me that his last answer was hardly an answer to the question. His answer was that in case there were bonds enough out which would absorb the entire 6 per cent or any other earnings of the railroad, they would be paid first. That is not an answer to the question that if, after the bonds were paid and the fixed charges were paid, or if there were no bonds still there was stock held by holders which represented the actual value of the road, and stock held by others which represented the excess value, how would the Senator determine which stockholders should have the excess after the bond interest was paid and which stockholders should have nothing? Suppose there are no bonds of the road, as an illustration, and the whole income, after the payment of charges, was to go in the form of dividends, the Senator says that certain stock should receive 6 per cent and certain other stock nothing. I am asking this question, as I asked it before and as I intend to ask it again of other Senators, How would that be determined? How would the Senator pick out certain stockholders and certain stock to receive the 6 per cent which he says they ought to have, and exclude other stockholders and other stock?

WHAT TO DO WITH WATERED STOCK NOT A MATTER THAT SHOULD CONCERN PUBLIC.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is not a public question, nor is it one that any law we can enact will answer; therefore I can not give an answer to it as a Senator, but I could answer it if I belonged to one or the other named classes of stockholders. If I were a holder of stock that had represented the actual value, and fraudulent or watered stock had been put upon the enterprise in opposition to my consent, I would object to it, and in some proper form of action ask that the dividends should be declared and paid upon the valid stock certificates. If, upon the other hand, I was among those who held certificates representing the fictitious stock, I should, of course, be in favor of an equality of division of what was left after the bonds and fixed charges had been taken care of.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How would you determine which was fictitious and which was not?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a matter that does not enter into the situation we are dealing with. It is not a public feature at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, Mr. President, I think, as has been said by many Senators here, it does. It is upon this overcapitalization, to which too severe epithets can not be applied, that these excess charges, which constitute in reality a tax upon the public, are based. That is what you are trying to cure by this and other legislation. What I am asking the Senator—as I asked the Senator from Wisconsin the other day and hope to have it answered before this debate is closed—is, How are you to determine what portion of the stockholders are to be paid and what portion are to be excluded?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. With the utmost deference to my friend from Indiana, I will say that this is not a public question. It is not a question with which Congress has any possible concern. It is a question that arises between different classes of stockholders. What we are authorized to do is to authorize quasi public corporations to levy a tax upon the public sufficient to pay a proper return upon the value of the property that they use for the public good; but as to how they are to distribute that fund is a matter for them to determine. If it produces insolvency, then the railroad company must be reorganized; the railroad will not be torn up, and the country will not be deprived of it, but somebody will take it who is willing to run it for a fair return upon its value. If they have got its ownership scattered among stockholders of different character, so that they can not tell the good from the bad, the public is not interested in that, nor is it to be taxed any more on that account than it would if it were honestly conducted. In other words, it does not inhere in our duty to adjust controversies of that sort between parties. We leave them to be settled by the common sense and the ingenuity of the lawbreaker, without calling at all on the ingenuity of the Congressional lawmaker to furnish any additional remedies.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Very cheerfully.

Mr. ALDRICH. Can the Senator tell me what the average passenger rate is in the State of Arkansas on Arkansas roads?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. About 3 cents a mile. That is the minimum.

Mr. ALDRICH. What is the average freight rate per ton per mile?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. All the traffic will bear.

Mr. ALDRICH. Can the Senator tell me about what it will bear?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is pretty high, but I have not the figures at hand.

Mr. ALDRICH. In other words, the truth is, I suppose, the rates in Arkansas are about twice what they are in other parts of the United States. I do not know whether it is the fault of the State of Arkansas or the fault of the railroads of Arkansas, yet I should think it would be a desirable proposition if the Senator could spend a little time investigating that question, because his people are interested in it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I want to put the railroads of Arkansas on the footing of "the most favored nation." I have no special complaint about the railroads of Arkansas that does not extend to every other railroad all over our country. I do not know any better roads in point of physical equipment. They are run, of course, by human beings.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will pardon me for another interjection, rather than a question, in response to the Senator's statement that this is not a public question. On the contrary, does not the Senator think the excuse for making these great charges that they are made in order to pay proper dividends upon overcapitalization, is really the greatest public question and the root public question of the whole thing? That is the reason why these so-called "excess charges" are made.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. We differ about the character of the question, not its importance. I think it is a private question instead of a public one. I think what we are called upon to do here is to see that the public is not taxed for the use of this public facility, this public utilty, any more than the service is worth, and the worth of the service is a fair return upon the actual value of the property employed for the public purpose and at the time it is so employed.

I did not originate that idea. There is nothing peculiar about it. There is nothing about it that I claim. I got it out of recorded utterances of the Supreme Court of the United States.

NO DIFFERENCE IN LAW BETWEEN BROAD AND NARROW COURT REVIEW.

When interrupted I was just entering on that part of my remarks in which I hope to be able to show that the single purposes for which the courts will take cognizance of the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of making rates is to determine whether or not the carrier's constitutional right to just compensation had been respected. The Supreme Court of the United States is the final arbiter in all disputes concerning the validity of Congressional legislation or that of the States. When that court decisively fixes the boundaries of legislative power and discretion it will accomplish no good purpose to insist that something in conflict therewith may be done, no matter how wholesome, as a matter of theory, it might prove to be if done. The doctrine of that court, as I think I will be able to show as I proceed, is that it will not hesitate to nullify the action of a legislative commission in fixing rates when it appears that the constitutional right of the carrier to just compensation would be invaded if it is compelled to charge and receive the rates as fixed. But the court has with equal emphasis decided that in determining this question it will not consider a single rate, but will take under review the entire body or schedule of rates which the railroad company is charging and collecting from its patrons. It is further established, as I think I may say without fear of successful contradiction, that the character of the service performed by the Commission in fixing rates is legislative and as such does not fall within the revisory powers of the court except for the single purpose of determining its harmony with the paramount restraints and guaranties of the Constitution. I read now from the opinion of the court in the case of San Diego Land Company v. National City (134 U. S., 754):

> But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just both to the owner and to the public—that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents, clearly and beyond all doubt, such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use.
> Each case must depend upon its special facts; and when a court, without assuming itself to prescribe rates, is required to determine whether the rates prescribed by the legislature for a corporation controlling a public highway are, as an entirety—
> Not a single rate, but as an entirety—
> so unjust as to destroy the value of its property for all the purposes for which is was acquired, its duty is to take into consideration the interests both of the public and of the owner of the property, together with all other circumstances that are fairly to be considered in determining whether the legislature has, under the guise of regulating rates, exceeded its constitutional authority, and practically deprived the owner of property without due process of law.
> What the company is entitled to demand, in order that it may have just compensation, is a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public. The property may have cost more than it ought to have cost—
> And it may have outstanding more bonds and stocks than it ought to have—
> and its outstanding bonds for money borrowed and which went into the plant may be in excess of the real value of the property. So that it can not be said that the amount of such bonds should in every case control the question of rates, although it may be an element in the inquiry as to what is, all the circumstances considered, just both to the company and to the public.

The test is the value of the property used on behalf of the public and at the time so employed, not how many bonds or shares of stock have been issued by the corporation owner.

Continuing, the court says:

> It is sufficient to say, upon a careful scrutiny of the testimony, our conclusion is that no case is made that will authorize a decree declaring that the rates fixed by defendant's ordinance, looking at them in their entirety—and we can not look at them in any other light—are such as to be a taking of property without just compensation.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I infer from the Senator's remarks that he does not think that the courts can ascertain whether the constitutional rights of the carrier have been invaded without an investigation into the whole subject as to all the rates.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir; that is my opinion.

Mr. ALDRICH. And as to the stocks and bonds and capital, etc. In other words, there can be no such thing as a narrow review.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; there can not be a narrow and there can not be a broad review. The courts can review for one purpose, that of determining whether the income of the railroad allowed by the Commission is sufficient to satisfy the constitutional demand of just compensation. That is what it means; that is all it means; you can not limit it and you can not make it any broader.

I repeat, so far as I am concerned, I would just as soon that the Senator from Rhode Island would write the review amendment as to write it myself, because they would both mean the same thing in law. You can put it into the bill that the court shall not review it, but it will review it, as it did in the Minnesota case, in 134 United States. The supreme court of Minnesota had construed the statute of that State to mean that the action of the Commission was final; the United State Supreme Court reversed this ruling, holding that the carrier could not be denied the right to show that the rate was confiscatory.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

IS RIGHT TO PREVENT DISCRIMINATION A JUDICIAL QUESTION?

Mr. BACON. The Senator has been giving very careful study to this particular branch, and I confess there are some features of the question which are troublesome to me. The question of review as to the particular matter of compensation is one thing. I want to know what is the Senator's view? I am asking this, not for the purpose of antagonizing whatever view he may express, but for the purpose of eliciting an expression from him. What is the Senator's view as to the power of Congress to confer upon the courts the right to call in question and review the orders of the Commission, not as to rates, but as to regulations and practices?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can answer that question by saying that anything of a legislative character done by the Commission can not be reviewed by a judicial tribunal. If you can frame a system of regulations by which a judicial question may be made to appear, the court will take charge of that and dispose of it in a proper case.

Mr. BACON. Of course I recognize that as a general proposition. It covers the question of compensation and every other question as to what is done by the Commission under the delegation of authority from Congress; but it was for the purpose of finding out what was the Senator's view as to whether or not this fell within the particular class of questions which the courts could be given authority by Congress to review.

The Senator will pardon me a moment. I want to draw, if I can, a distinction between the class of questions where the authority of the court would obtain, under the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas, regardless of what Congress might do on the question of compensation. Recognizing that now as correct, when it comes to the question of compensation, the power conferred or withheld by Congress, according to the view of the Senator, will not amount to anything, the courts having a certain jurisdiction which they will certainly, in the absence of any distinct denial of it, and even in some cases with the denial of it, exercise. The point I want the Senator's expression upon—and I repeat I do it for the purpose of getting his view, as he seems to have given very careful study to this particular branch, as well as other branches of the subject—is as to the power of Congress to confer upon the courts the duty and the authority to review the orders of the Commission which do not relate to compensation, but which relate to regulation and practice, because there, it seems to me, is the doubtful domain.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose it involves compensation?

Mr. BACON. I want to leave that out. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests, soto voce, "Suppose it involves compensation?" I want to leave that out of the present question, because I want to draw the distinction clearly, if possible, between the authority given to the court to review so much of the orders as involve the constitutional question of compensation and other orders which do not involve that, but which do involve questions of regulation and practice.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will pardon me just a moment until I finish my statement.

I started to give an illustration, but I do not know that I am sufficiently familiar with railroad matters to give it clearly, but I would rather enlarge what I have said. The same question might be suggested as to the orders of the Commission, which should be deemed to be preferential, which should be deemed to give a preference—and I use the word "preferential" not in its technical sense there—which should be deemed to give a preference to one community over another community upon the same line. That is not a question of compensation, but it may be a most vital question in the practical administration of this law as to whether or not the orders of the Commission in all these matters of regulation and practice shall be final with them, or whether the courts shall be distinctly vested by Congress with the power to pass them under review. I think it extremely important that the court should have the power to pass upon the question whether or not the Commission has given preference to one community over another. It may be at some time of most vital importance to the business of a community; it may involve its business life or death, and for that reason I am particularly anxious to hear the learned and distinguished Senator upon that particular phase from a legal standpoint, under the authorities, as to what is the power of Congress to devolve upon a court the authority to review orders which do not relate to matters of compensation, but which do relate to the vital matters of regulation and practice.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is hard——

Mr. ALDRICH. When I sought to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; I ought to have yielded to him earlier.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will let the Senator from Arkansas respond to my inquiry, because I am anxious to get a concrete answer, if possible.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will wait until the Senator from Arkansas answers that question, and then I will call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to some provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I could not answer wholesale that question. Before I can answer intelligently I must have my attention directed to the particular practice called in question.

Mr. BACON. I will call the attention of the Senator to one, if he will pardon me. Suppose upon the same line of road—and I say the same line, I mean the connecting road—an order of the Commission is deemed to give a preference to one community over another, thinking it has equal rights in the matter of interstate commerce affected by that particular order. Does the Senator think, outside of the provisions of this bill—I am not speaking about that, I am speaking about constitutional power, because that is what the Senator is so earnestly and learnedly discussing—under the constitutional power it is within the province of Congress to give to the courts the power to review and set aside as unjust an order of the Commission which gives a preference to one community over another community?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certain elements of discretion and policy enter into this whole business of rate making. There are different theories on which it may be done. There is the mileage basis, for instance; or, on the other hand, the Commission might take into consideration the question of the economic distribution of products, so that one rate would be relatively higher than another. Those are matters of policy and wisdom to be weighed and concluded by the Commission. In the exercise of that power the Commission may abuse it, and so obviously so as to be guilty of fraud, when it can be attacked by any shipper or community, where the instance of discrimination is so pronounced that honest men would not differ in saying that the Commission had not been actuated by proper motives in doing what it did. There is a measure of discretion in matters of that kind. That would probably be referred to the Commission. To what extent the courts would undertake to control them I am not prepared to say. I would have to know all the facts of the particular case.

Much that is said in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company (145 U. S., 263) would indicate that the courts will interfere to prevent undue preferences as between individuals and localities. But in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Detroit (167 U. S., 646) the court says much must be left to the discretion of the Commission, but how much the courts will tolerate before interfering to enforce some constitutional right said to be violated is the question.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, and I do not unduly interrupt him, I am not limiting the question to what the courts would undertake to do as a matter of inherent jurisdiction, if I may so term it, but I am speaking with practical reference to what we do in the framing of this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think we can direct the Commission to make all the rates upon a mileage basis. When we do it we will hear from somebody.

Mr. BACON. I think so, too, and for one I would not——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will pardon me for a moment, and let me finish the question. That is true. I think the Senator from Arkansas is correct, that we would hear from a number of people on that subject. But I wanted to know, with a view to guiding my own actions, whether, in the opinion of the Senator, we would be within constitutional bounds if we inserted in this bill what I think ought to be inserted in it—if we have the constitutional authority to do it—that if the Commission issues an order which gives a preference to one community over another community claiming the right to equal privileges——

Mr. SPOONER. An undue preference.

Mr. BACON. That is a question of degree; whether we can insert in this bill, and constitutionally insert in it, a provision giving to the courts the authority to review the order of the Commission giving a preference to one community over another community in the rate which it established.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Arkansas does not object, I will call the attention of the Senator from Georgia to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has already decided that under existing law a discrimination against a community made by the railroads in the fixing of their rates may be enjoined at the suit of the Interstate Commerce Commission, predicated upon a complaint made to it of such discrimination. The case is reported in 189 United States, page 274, and is known as the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. The Missouri Pacific Railroad, otherwise known as the Wichita case. It was a suit commenced before the passage of the Elkins law, and the jurisdiction of the court was contested, but when it went to the Supreme Court the Elkins law had been in the meanwhile passed, and the Supreme Court said, without regard to what the law prior to that time provided, under the Elkins law such a suit can be maintained.

If so, I do not see why we should be complicating the situation by seeking a remedy of that kind through some other sort of legislation. It is just as clear as anything can be, and it is upon that section of the Elkins laws—and that is the reason why I have broken in with this interruption, which I very much dislike to do—it is upon that section of the Elkins law that I think our attention ought to be turned. I have sought by the amendment I have offered to broaden and strengthen that provision, so as to have all suits of that character brought at the expense of the Government instead of at the expense of the individual litigant.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is one of the things——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will let the Senator from Arkansas give me a response to my question; but before he does so I want to say a word. I recognize that he has clearly indicated the correct line of cleavage between acts which are legislative and which can not be reviewed and acts which are not legislative; and I wanted to find out, as the result of the Senator's investigation, into which class he considers that this particular question falls; whether the action of the Commission in fixing a rate which is alleged to give a preference to one community over another community is such a legislative act, or, rather, such a performance of a delegated legislative intent on the part of the Legislature as would exclude it from the class of questions which can be considered by the court, or whether it is, on the other hand, of the other class, where the court might voluntarily take jurisdiction, or where we could with propriety expressly and explicitly require it to be done in this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The question as to whether any community or any shipper can complain of a discrimination of rates that are fixed by the Commission is not here. I have no hesitancy in saying that the Commission has a certain latitude of discretion and policy that is available to them in making up their orders and fixing rates which may upon their face appear to be discriminatory between communities. The extent of that would determine its legality. The court might say it was a fraudulent exercise of power, which presents an inquiry always the subject of judicial inquiry.

The case cited by the Senator from Ohio hardly answers the question of the Senator from Georgia, for the reason that there the Interstate Commerce Commission brought the action, whereas he is inquiring as to whether we can authorize the shipper or the community to bring an action against the Commission to correct its work.

Mr. FORAKER. I apprehend that if we can authorize the Commission to bring a suit on behalf of the shipper, we could authorize the shipper himself to bring it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Against the Commission?

Mr. FORAKER. Against the railroad.

Mr. BACON. But that is not the question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Against the Commission.

Mr. FORAKER. Oh! To bring it against the Commission?

Mr. BACON. I asked the question because I think it is perfectly proper for us in the enactment of this legislation to anticipate not simply the possibility, but the probability, that the time may come when the Commission will fall under the influence of the railroads.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And will Congress also fall under the influence of the railroads?

Mr. BACON. It is so charged by some, but I think unjustly.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I deem it to be rather an excessive fear to assume the existence of a condition when improper influences will not only control the action of the Commission, but the corrective power of Congress as well. The courts might not preserve their independence in such surroundings.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will recognize the fact that when it comes to an administrative officer, the ease with which such influence can be exerted is very much greater. It is different from where Senators and Representatives are chosen from the length and breadth of this land.

Mr. FORAKER. I had just come into the Chamber, and I may be under a misapprehension as to what preceded. But what difficulty is there about authorizing any person who may be aggrieved to bring a suit to test the validity of an order that has been made by the Commission? The law as it now stand authorizes anyone who is aggrieved by an order that is made to put it to the test in the court.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have been trying to get the attention of the Senator from Georgia to a statement which I desire to make, which is along the lines of that made by the Senator from Ohio.

The Senator from Georgia was asking this question, as I understood him—whether Congress could give to the courts power to review the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission affecting regulations and practices where no question of rates is involved.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. And he cited questions of discrimination.

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. Now, what I was about to say was that we did that precise thing in the Elkins law. We gave to the courts power to review questions of discrimination where it had been once heard by the Commission, and the Supreme Court of the United States, as the Senator from Ohio has said, in the Wichita case upheld the validity of that act. I think that answers the Senator from Georgia. It seems to me it does clearly.

Mr. BACON. Where does the Senator draw the line? Does the Senator mean to say that, according to his view, we could give to the Commission—I am not speaking of the propriety of it, but of the power—certain powers, and, as to the exercise of each and every one of those powers, we could give to the courts the right to review?

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not make the statement as broad as that. The Senator's question was not as broad as that.

Mr. BACON. Is that the Senator's view?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is hardly a question which anybody ought to be required to answer. The Senator was putting a concrete case, and I was saying with respect to it that exactly what the Senator asked whether Congress had the power to do Congress had done, and the court upheld that action.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will answer that question generally, and pass on. Courts have jurisdiction to hear any judicial question, and it is a difficult matter to keep them from doing it in a proper case. They have no jurisdiction to hear and determine anything which pertains to legislative policy or legislative discretion, and you can not confer upon them authority to do so. A question may partake of the nature of both. I think a legislative duty may be performed in a way to conflict with some constitutional right, and when that is the case the courts will take possession of the controversy for the purpose of settling it, just as they have taken possession of the rate-making question for the purpose of determining whether the completed action of the commission leaves to the carrier just compensation for the service it renders. I say there is a discretion there. It must not be granted simply because it is asked for. The court says the rule is that before it will interfere with rates fixed by legislative authority that the case must show such a palpable invasion of the right of the carrier that honest men will not differ about the result.

Now, I was insisting that the one function that the court would discharge in connection with this rate-making business—and I was on the rate-making branch of it at the time—was to determine the only judicial question in the controversy viewed from that standpoint, and that was whether or not the body of rates afforded to carriers just compensation for the use of its property.

COURTS DO NOT SIT AS APPELLATE BOARD OF REVIEW.

I read now from the case of the San Diego Land Company v. Jasper (189 U. S.), the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Holmes:

> The main object of attack is the valuation of the plant. It no longer is open to dispute that under the Constitution "what the company is entitled to demand, in order that it may have just compensation, is a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public.

Again:

> We will say a word about the opposite contention of the appellant, that there should have been allowance for depreciation over and above the allowance for repairs. From a constitutional point of view we see no sufficient evidence that the allowance for 6 per cent on the value set by the supervisors, in addition to what was allowed for repairs, is confiscatory. On the other hand, if the claim is made under the statute, although that would be no ground for bringing the case to this court, it has been decided by the supreme court of California that the statute warrants no such claim. (Redlands, Lugonia and Crafton Domestic Water Co. v. Redlands, 121, California, 312, 313.) We go no further into detail. We do not sit as a general appellate board of revision for all rates and taxes in the United States. We stop with considering whether it clearly appears that the Constitution of the United States has been infringed, together with such collateral questions as may be incidental to our jurisdiction over that ONE.

The court will look into it with a view of determining whether or not a constitutional right has been invaded. The Constitution is above the statute. The obligation to bring about conformity between laws and alleged laws, striking down those that are invalid and maintaining those that are valid, is the supreme function of the court. It is the only question connected with the legislative function of prescribing rates that has ever been brought before the court and decided.

In Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company v. Minnesota (186 U. S.), the court, in the course of its opinion, says:

> While we never have decided that the Commission may compel such reductions, we do not think it beyond the power of the State commission to reduce the freight upon a particular article, provided the companies are able to earn a fair profit upon their entire business, and that the burden is upon them to impeach the action of the Commission in this particular.

In that case the carrier was compelled to haul coal from Duluth to St. Paul and places south of there for a less rate than it thought it ought to have. It made a difference of about $1,500 in the income of a railroad whose gross income was $700,000. The court said the matter was too trifling to affect the general question of just compensation. It could not determine the matter on the basis of that single rate. What it looked at was the entire body of rates; and if those rates, looked at as an entirety, produce a sufficient income to satisfy the constitutional guaranty of just compensation, they would allow the other matter to be disposed of in some administrative way.

Summing up in the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company (167 U. S., p. 469), Judge Brewer, in his opinion, said:

> It is one thing to inquire whether the rates which have been charged and collected are reasonable—that is a judicial act; but an entirely different thing to prescribe rates which shall be charged in the future—that is a legislative act.

We have therefore these considerations presented:

First. The power to prescribe a tariff of rates for carriage by a common carrier is a legislative and not an administrative or judicial function, and having respect to the large amount of property invested in railroads, the various companies engaged therein, the thousands of miles of road, and the millions of tons of freight carried, the varying and diverse conditions attaching to such carriage, is a power of supreme delicacy and importance.

And again, on page 511, as follows:

Our conclusion, then, is that Congress has not conferred upon the Commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum or minimum or absolute.

In the case of the Chicago Railroad v. Wellman (143 U. S.) the judge who wrote the opinion said:

The legislature has the power to fix rates, and the extent of judicial interference is protection against unreasonable rates.

Judge Brewer, in the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Company (154 U. S.), said:

It is doubtless true as a general proposition that the formation of a tariff of charges for the transportation by a common carrier of persons or property is a legislative or administrative rather than a judicial function. * * * The courts are not authorized to revise or change a body of rates imposed by the legislature or a commission; they do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or what under all the circumstances would be fair and reasonable as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work; but still there can be no doubt of their power and duty to inquire whether a body of rates prescribed by a legislature or a commission is unjust or unreasonable, and such as to work a practical destruction to rights of property, and, if found so to be, to restrain its operation. * * *

The challenge in this case is of the tariff as a whole, and not of any particular rate upon any single class of goods. As we have seen, it is not the function of the courts to establish a schedule of rates. It is not, therefore, within our power to prepare a new schedule or rearrange this. Our inquiry is limited to the effect of the tariff as a whole, including therein the rates prescribed for all the several classes of goods, and the decree must either condemn or sustain this act of quasi legislation.

If a law be adjudged invalid, the court may not, in the decree, attempt to enact a law upon the same subject which shall be obnoxious to no legal objections. It stops with simply passing its judgment on the validity of the act before it. The same rule obtains in a case like this.

If that is the only judicial feature in the business of making rates; if that is the only judicial aspect in which it can be considered; it is perfectly obvious that the court can not undertake to substitute its judgment as to a matter of policy or discretion for that of the Commission. They can review the entire action of the Commission with one object in view, and that is, to determine whether or not the carrier has been protected in his constitutional right to just compensation. That being the case, it is unnecessary in a body composed so largely as this is of lawyers to cite authorities in support of the proposition that courts will refuse, if called upon, to exercise a revisory power over legislation with a view of correction if they should differ in opinion as to a matter of policy with the legislature.

In Gordon v. The United States (117 U. S.), the opinion having been prepared by Chief Justice Taney, and which has been referred to with strong approval by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the court sustains the proposition. I am content that the court will decline, when called on by Congress, to pass on any question not of a strictly judicial character. I will read just enough of the opinion to show what that court thought of the principle at that time:

This power over legislative acts is not possessed by the English courts. They can not declare an act of Parliament void, because, in the opinion of the court, it is inconsistent with the principles of Magna Charta or the Petition of Rights. They are bound to obey it and carry it into execution. Yet, in that country, the independence of the judiciary is invariably respected and upheld by the King and the Parliament, as well as by the courts; and the courts are never required to pass judgment in a suit where they can not carry it into execution, and where it is inoperative and of no value, unless sanctioned by a future act of Parliament. The judicial power is carefully and effectually separated from the executive and legislative departments. The language of Blackstone upon this subject is plain and unequivocal.

Quoting Blackstone, who says:

In this distinct and separate existence of the judicial power in a peculiar body of men, nominated indeed but not removable at pleasure by the Crown, consists one main preservative of public liberty, which can not subsist long in any state unless the administration of common justice be in some degree separated from the legislative and executive power. Were it joined with the legislative, the life, liberty, and property of the subject would be in the hands of arbitrary judges, whose decisions would be then regulated only by their own opinions, and not by any fundamental principles of law, which, though legislators may depart from, yet judges are bound to observe. Were it joined with the executive, the union might soon be an overbalance for the legislative. For which reason, by statute (Car. I, chap. 10), which abolished the court of star chamber, effectual care is taken to remove all judicial power out of the hands of the King's privy council, which it was then evident, from recent instances, might soon be inclined to pronounce that for a law which was most agreeable to the Prince or his officers.

Judge Taney proceeds:

These cardinal principles of free government have not only been long established in England, but also in the United States from the time of their earliest colonization, and guided the American people in framing and adopting the present Constitution. And it is the duty of this court to maintain it unimpaired as far as it may have the power. And while it executes firmly all the judicial powers intrusted to it, the court will carefully abstain from exercising any power that is not strictly judicial in its character and which is not clearly confided to it by the Constitution. (117 U. S., 707.)

Mr. FULTON. I understand the Senator's position to be that the only question that can become judicial in this matter of rate making is whether or not a prescribed rate amounts to confiscation or is an invasion of the constitutional rights of the carrier to have a just compensation. Now, I ask the Senator if the courts have not, when the question was whether a rate prescribed by the carrier is or is not a reasonable rate, taken jurisdiction of such cases, and whether they have not enjoined the carrier from charging a rate which they held to be unreasonably high; and if they have done that, does not that amount to prescribing a maximum rate for the future?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In the first place, I am not familiar with any case where the courts have enjoined a railroad from charging too much. I am familiar with a line of cases where carriers have been sued to recover back after payment of the excess beyond what is reasonable.

Mr. FULTON. I call the Senator's attention to a case where the Commission has condemned a rate established by the railroad as being unreasonably high. Under the law as it stands at the present time the Commission is authorized to institute a suit against the railroad company to enjoin the exaction of such rates in the future. Now, such cases have been twice, if I remember correctly, before to the Supreme Court, and have gone off on another question. But the circuit courts have enjoined such rates as being unreasonably high—extortionate. I ask the Senator——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Enjoined the Commission's rates?

Mr. FULTON. No; enjoined the rates of the railroad at the suit of the Commission—enjoined them as extortionate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is in line with my argument.

Mr. FULTON. It is not in line with the Senator's contention that the only time that the question as to a rate becomes judicial is when it is confiscatory. It is just exactly the opposite.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is a question in the instance named by the Senator of complying with the order of the Commission. It is a question of complying with the legislation and not antagonizing it.

Mr. FULTON. The court goes into the inquiry whether the rate is unreasonably high.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It goes into the inquiry for the purpose of determining whether, as the Commission has said, it is unreasonably high, and if found to be so, for the purpose of enforcing the order of the Commission.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator this: Whenever it is taken before a court to determine whether a rate is reasonable or not, does it not then become a judicial question which the court must determine? When issue is joined on that, whether it be between the Commission and a railroad company or a private shipper and a railroad company—when issue is joined, whether a charge made by the railroad is reasonable, is not the question a judicial one?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; it is a legislative one in many of its aspects. Judge Brewer, in opinions, says whether a completed rate that has been charged is reasonable or not for the services rendered is a judicial question. The question as to what will be reasonable rates for the future is a legislative question. As the Commission makes its rates entirely for the future, its action is not judicial. Then, of course, the circumstance as to whether the challenged rate was one made by the railroad company, as in the absence of action by the sovereignty it may do, or was one that was prescribed by the legislature, either directly or through the agency of a commission, would determine its character as being of judicial or legislative cognizance. A railroad-made rate may be challenged for excessiveness in court, and the court may determine that it is excessive and give judgment for the recovery of the excess wrongfully demanded. But it is quite another thing for a carrier to go into court asking for a review of rates fixed by legislative authority. This character of rates are subject to assault in their entirety only on the ground that the body of rates will not yield revenue sufficient to afford the carrier just compensation for the use of its property. This is the only inquiry subject to court review, and even in this connection the court, although it may decide that the rate is too low, will not modify the legislative rate to the extent only that it finds it to be less than the carrier is entitled to, but will nullify the entire rate fixed, leaving an excessive railroad-made rate in force.

Mr. FULTON. If that be true, and if it is always a legislative question unless there is an invasion of the constitutional rights of the carrier, how can the Commission under the present law condemn a rate charged by the railroads and recommend a lower rate, and the railroad company refusing to obey the recommendation of the Commission, maintain a suit to have the rate charged by the company enjoined as being too high if it is always a legislative question?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The present law says that a suit of that character may be brought, but in the event it is, the finding of the Commission is only prima facie unreasonable.

Mr. FULTON. Who determines whether or not the rate is unreasonably high?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Commission has only indicated an opinion. They have no power to fix a rate. They do not make a decisive order. They do not assume to fix the rate. We are now attempting to give power to fix the rate.

Mr. FULTON. Before the court, finally, who determines whether or not the rate is unreasonably high?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Commission sends it to the court with the simple statement that that is, in its opinion, prima facie excessive. The nature of the reference shows that the Commission has not fixed a rate, and has no power to do so.

Mr. FULTON. Suppose the court finally determines that the Commission was wrong; that the rate was not unreasonably high?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is sent there for that specific purpose——

Mr. FULTON. Does not the court exercise——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. With the statement that it is prima facie excessive, and then the court determines whether or not there has been a showing made which overcomes the prima facie showing.

Mr. FULTON. Does not the court exercise judicial power in determining that question——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In the first place, the Supreme Court——

Mr. FULTON. Or does it exercise legislative power?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is exercising judicial power alone in whatever it does in that connection. The rate under investigation is one made by the railroad company, and such rates are subject to judicial action. In a Commission-made rate the immunity from judicial revision arises from the fact that the Commission's action is in effect that of the legislature. Judicial supervision of legislative action goes no further than to determine its conformity to the Constitution.

Mr. FULTON. It is a judicial question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is a judicial question in so far as it assails a rate made by the railroad company. The matter comes to the court for the purpose of showing the unreasonableness of the railroad-made rate. The Commission indicated an opinion which is to be deemed evidence and not a finding, and this is to receive a presumption of prima facie verity. The Supreme Court in 167 United States decided that the Commission did not have power to fix a rate. The cases mentioned by the Senator from Oregon do not appear to me as overruling all of these other cases, wherein it is said so specifically and emphatically that the only question that is judicial in dealing with a legislatively fixed rate is to determine whether or not the carrier was getting enough out of the rate allowed to satisfy the constitutional guaranty of just compensation.

Mr. FULTON. I would not contend that the cases I suggest overrule the case the Senator has read or that they are even inconsistent. But in the Reagan case, and the other case read by the Senator, the court was speaking simply of the case that was before it. It was not speaking of a case where issue might be joined as to whether the rate was too high, because manifestly issue may be joined in a case as to whether a rate is too high. Otherwise at common law a shipper could not go in and enjoin a rate if it was too high nor could the Commission go in and enjoin a rate if it was too high. If it was not a legislative question and not a constitutional question, manifestly it must be a judicial question when issue is joined whether it be contended that the rate is unreasonably high or unreasonably low.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not conceive of a case where the Commission will fix a rate and go into court and ask to have it enjoined on the ground that it is too high.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator misunderstands me. The Commission under the law as at present does not fix the rate, but it inquires on complaint whether or not a rate established by the railroad is unreasonably high. It condemns a rate, we will say, but nevertheless the railroad continues to charge the rate. The Commission then brings suit to enjoin that rate, and the court must determine whether or not the rate is unreasonably high in order to sustain the order of the Commission and grant the relief prayed for, and in determining that question I submit it determines a judicial question. The question does become judicial when issue is joined on that proposition.

COMMISSION HAS NOW NO POWER TO FIX RATES.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The defect in the position assumed by the Senator's question is that the Commission has fixed no rate. They have simply made a finding that in their opinion a given rate made by the railroad is too high, and that the proper rate ought to be so and so, provided no evidence is offered to the court in the controversy which shall overcome the prima facie force and effect of this finding. They do not fix any rate; they have no authority to do it; they are expressly forbidden by not having the power to do so conferred in express terms. In the absence of legislative action the rate fixed by the carrier is always subject to investigation from a judicial standpoint by those who have to pay it. But that is a different question from attacking a rate fixed by legislation.

To make more clear my answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], as I understand him, I will emphasize by stating this: The action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in condemning the railroad-made rate is efficient to the extent only of precipitating or creating an inquiry which involves that rate. The Commission does not assume to make a rate, and therefore no part of the legislative power of the Government inheres in its action. It simply challenges a rate, and when the court comes to pass upon the reasonableness of it it is not called upon to exercise its judgment as to whether or not a legislative body has erred, but it deals with a rate made by the corporation itself. Railroad-made rates have always been subject to judicial investigation with reference to their reasonableness in all proper cases. To assume that simply because the Interstate Commerce Commission challenges a rate it thereby prescribes the rate it suggests would be, in effect, to give by indirection to the Commission the rate-making power. This has never been done, but we trust that it will not be long before this statement can not be made. The force of my answer to the Senator from Oregon may be made plainer by calling his attention to what the Supreme Court has said on the subject. The court, in Interstate Commerce Commission v. Railway Company (167 U. S., 511), said:

> Our conclusion, then, is that Congress has not conferred upon the Commission the legislative power of prescribing rates, either maximum or minimum or absolute. As it did not give the express power to the Commission, it did not intend to secure the same result indirectly by empowering that tribunal to determine what in reference to the past was reasonable and just, whether as maximum, minimum, or absolute, and then enable it to obtain from the courts a peremptory order that in the future the railroad companies should follow the rates thus determined to have been in the past reasonable and just.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to say, before asking the question, that I realize the Senator has been on the floor a good while and he may be tired. So I will not annoy him.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not in the least fatigued. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. I do not wish to detain him.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will not be disturbed by the interruption of the Senator.

Mr. FULTON. The Senator was saying a while ago that the only question which could be determined on review would be the question as to whether or not the constitutional right of the carrier had been invaded—the question as to whether or not the rate prescribed by the Commission afforded just compensation—and hence I understood the Senator to say it made no difference in what language the review should be framed, whether a broad or a narrow review, that but one review could be had.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true as to revision of rates fixed by the Commission.

Mr. FULTON. I ask the Senator if that is not rather a mistaken conception of the situation, in view of the fact that there are many orders and regulations which the Commission would be authorized to prescribe which do not involve the question of just compensation at all. For instance, requiring a carrier to furnish cars to a shipper, there being no question as to what the charge should be, but simply that they should be required to furnish the cars. The question of just compensation would not come in there. It would be a mere matter of regulation or practice. Under a broad review might not such an order as that be taken up before the court? What I mean by broad review is unlimited review.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I intended to answer both the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Rhode Island by saying that I was, at the time when I was interrupted, addressing myself particularly to the business of making rates. I had not at that time reached the stage of my argument where I had occasion to refer to the other matter. But I will say now, if one of these orders now mentioned by the Senator from Oregon presents a judicial aspect or presents an issue that is judicial in character in the sense that the court can deal with it to vindicate a right growing out of it or to redress a wrong imposed by it, it will do so. But if it is called upon to substitute its notions of policy and expediency for that of the Commission it will not do so. But if it is one of these matters, the manner of doing which lies in the wisdom and discretion of the Commission, the courts will not review or supervise the manner of its being done. My answer, generally, is, if it is a matter that does not involve the rate-making business, it may be of such a character that it will become a subject of judicial investigation.

I can not get any nearer to a definite answer than to say that each one of these orders would have to be determined on its own facts. But as to a rate-making provision, expressing the opinion derived from the uniform decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, repeated so often, until now when it is necessary to refer to the doctrine, it is disposed of in a single sentence by the court, as it did in San Diego v. Jasper (189 U. S., 446), by saying:

> We do not sit as a general appellate board of revision for all rates and taxes in the United States.

The rate-making power, I think, is the principal feature of the pending bill. There are other abuses that ought to be corrected here. It may be some of these are of a judicial nature, but I do not pretend to go into that now. If I could, I would give to the court a right to dispose of such things as naturally and properly belong to it; but I do maintain, as earnestly as I can, that in the matter of rate making there is no room now for assuming that any feature of that duty can be referred to the courts to be passed upon in the nature of a review of the action of the Commission. In the first place, it would be folly to do it. The whole agitation connected with this question for a broad court review implies that the Commission is to be a mere figurehead; that its orders are never to amount to anything until permission to enforce the same is given by the courts. There is a popular belief, widespread in the community, that no legislative action ought to take effect on large interests until it has been subjected to the scrutiny and approval of the Supreme Court. The impression is general that Congress can not enact laws that large interests are compelled to obey in advance of judicial approval. Judge Brewer himself seems to have made a concession to that heresy in the opinion delivered by him in 183 United States, in the Kansas City Stockyards case, in which he intimated that because penalties would attach while litigation concerning the validity was pending there was reason for assuming that that feature of the act was unconstitutional.

IF COURTS CAN REVIEW EVERYTHING, NO PLACE FOR A COMMISSION.

Now, if it were competent for Congress to send the whole rate-making business to the court, there would be no sense in having a Commission to make the rates in the first instance, and we are guilty of the folly that it is said was once practiced by a King of England. He had two cats, a large one and a small one, and desiring to permit them to pass from one room to another, he had two holes cut through the wall, one large one for the large cat and one small one for the small cat. It is not necessary at all to have a Commission if the ultimate rate is to be made by the court, as it will be if the whole matter is to be remitted for revision to the judgment of the court. Then the proposition of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] would be the only logical and sensible one to adopt, and he would let the court take it up to start with. Proceeding with the citations from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States showing that the courts will not entertain jurisdiction to review any matter or question not of a strictly judicial character, I call attention to what is said in the case of the United States Commerce Commission v. Brinson (154 U. S., 482). It is there said:

> It is too evident for argument—

This is on the question whether or not the court will exercise anything but judicial duty—

> It is too evident for argument on the subject that such a tribunal is not a judicial one and that the act of Congress did not intend to make it one.
> The authority conferred on the respective judges was nothing more than that of a commissioner—

The quotation proceeds—

> The authority conferred on the respective judges was nothing more than that which constituted each then commissioner to adjust certain claims against the United States; and the office of judges and their respective jurisdictions are referred to in the law merely as a designation of the persons to whom the authority is confided and the territorial limits to which it extends. The decision is not the judgment of a court of justice. It is the award of a commission.

The court refused to entertain the appeal.

Mr. BACON. What is that case?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is from Interstate Commerce Commission against Brimson, in 154 United States, page 482, the opinion being delivered by Mr. Justice Harlan, who quoted from the Ferreira case in 13 Howard, which I have just read.

The court also reviews three or four more cases on the subject where pension claims were referred to the court, but it decided that the questions involved were not judicial and declined to hear them. There is a very elaborate and learned opinion of Judge Gray on the same subject in the Supreme Court Reports of the State of Massachusetts. The legislature of Massachusetts imposed upon the supreme court the duty of appointing election commissioners. The court held that this was not a judicial duty, and declined to perform it. The case is reported as Supervisors of Elections, 114 Mass., 247.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I have been extremely unfortunate with respect to the Senator's speech, having been compelled to be out of the Chamber a good part of the time, to my misfortune, very greatly, I know. But I have come in at a very interesting time to me. I hope the Senator will allow me to interrupt him until I see whether I understand the point of the argument he is now making.

We are all agreed, of course, that a court will not undertake to discharge any but judicial duties, but do I understand the Senator to say that a court will not entertain a bill complaining of a rate that it is in excess of what may be a lawful rate, and grant relief, if it finds that the grounds of the bill are supported by evidence, in the way of enjoining all in excess of what is lawful?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator understands me to say that when a commission, in the exercise of legislative power, fixes a rate, that the court can not do anything but strike the commission rate down entirely or let it all stand.

Mr. FORAKER. There was a time when I had that impression myself, but when I investigated this subject further I changed my mind about it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I would be glad if the Senator would give me the benefit of his conclusion and the reason for it, and the legal authorities that produced the change.

Mr. FORAKER. It is all very clear in my mind that I was originally mistaken. If the Senator will allow me to put an illustration: I heard him a moment ago, when I was in the Chamber, before I was again called out of it, talk about making rates upon a mileage basis. Let us suppose that the commission be created, and that it be authorized to fix rates according to a mileage basis, and that according to the mileage basis prescribed by Congress a rate from one city to another on first-class goods should be a dollar. That would be mathematically calculated. The rate prescribed by Congress, therefore, by the commission, prescribed, I mean, by making the standard, would be a dollar. Now, suppose instead of that the railroads fix a rate at a dollar and a half, would not the shipper have a right, or would not the commission, if we authorized such a procedure, have a right on behalf of all the shippers thus interested to go into a court of equity and complain that the lawful rate fixed by Congress through the commission was a dollar, but that they were charging, notwithstanding that fact, in violation of law, a dollar and a half, and ask the court to enjoin all in excess of the lawful rate of $1. Would not the court have jurisdiction to grant that relief—not to make a rate, the Senator will observe, but to prohibit the road from collecting any but the lawful rate, to give effect by its order to the will of Congress?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not see that there is any question of making the rate involved in it. It is simply compelling, by mandatory proceedings, the carrier to comply with the law already made by the law-making power.

Mr. FORAKER. Would it not be competent, if we provided that relief might be by injunction, for the court to enjoin all in excess of the lawful rate? That is precisely what I am proposing to do in the amendment I have offered.

I am glad the Senator has taken up this subject, as I have a great number of authorities that I want to read to the Senate when I have an opportunity to do so, sustaining that proposition.

Now, if it would be clear, as it seems to me every Senator must concede it would be, that a court would have jurisdiction in the kind of a case I put, to enjoin all in excess of the lawful rate, surely it would have like power, if we conferred that kind of jurisdiction upon the court, to enjoin all in excess of what would be a just and reasonable rate, as to which the court would hear the testimony and determine, for that is but a judicial function as old as the administration of justice, what is just and reasonable whenever in the administration of the law a question of that kind arises, as it most frequently does in connection with the exercise of the police power.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The case instanced by the Senator from Ohio does not present the question of fixing the rate at all. It is simply a question of complying with the order made by the legislative commission. The court would not undertake to say whether it was reasonable or unreasonable, being a single rate, but would simply determine whether or not the Commission had prescribed that rate. That would be the judicial question.

Mr. FORAKER. I suppose the Senator would agree with me about that in the case put, the rate having been made by the Commission and the road not conforming to what the Commission required, or the Commission in the one case not having conformed to what Congress required, and I just wanted to ask him what difference there is in principle between resorting to the court for relief against a rate made by the railroad, having no commission whatever to make rates, and thus getting relief against unreasonable rates?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Nobody pretends that the railroad rates are legislatively fixed. Railroad-made rates are always open to attack in the courts by the shipper for unreasonableness. Nobody pretends that the railroads are in fact legislative bodies, although it is said they too frequently exert considerable influence on legislation.

Mr. FORAKER. They are not; but Congress passes a law saying that all rates shall be reasonable and just, and that anything in excess of what is reasonable and just shall be unreasonable and unjust——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is the law.

Mr. FORAKER. And therefore illegal and unlawful.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That much would be the law without Congress reenacting it.

Mr. FORAKER. So it would. It is only declaratory of the common law. As a matter of policy we had already adopted that rule as applicable to the making of rates. But if Congress says that there shall be only reasonable and just rates made and enforced, any shipper has a right to complain that the rate he is required to pay is in excess of what the law authorized the railroads to collect. Therefore, the shipper under the law as it now is, can, in his own name, apply to any court of equity that has jurisdiction for relief against an extortionate rate. Certainly under the Elkins law either the shipper or a community will have a right, applying to the Commission, to have the Commission, if the Commission thinks there is reasonable ground for the complaint, to bring such a suit as that and seek that relief and secure it. That has been held repeatedly.

In the seventh Federal Reporter, and again in the eighth Federal Reporter, there are decisions to that effect, and in a number of other volumes there are cases to be found which sustain that proposition. I will not take the Senator's time now to cite those authorities, because it would be like making a speech in his time, but I want to call his attention to the proposition with the statement that I do desire to present that very point.

RAILROAD TOO POWERFUL FOR RESISTANCE BY INDIVIDUAL SHIPPER.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The courts have invariably taken the very widest liberty with the rates fixed by railroads in order to determine whether or not they are reasonable, but they have only occasionally done so, because the average shipper who complains finds that he loses if he wins; that the contest is an unequal one. He soon finds that he is engaged in a mighty poor business when involved in a controversy of that kind with a railroad, which has very largely the power of commercial life or death over him. So it is, in fact, an abstract right, and one that is very rarely ever resorted to.

Mr. FORAKER. On that I agree with the Senator precisely, and I think we should provide in this legislation for such an amendment of the Elkins law as will authorize all suits of that kind to be tried without expense to the shipper or without expense to the complainant, whether the complainant be a shipper or a community, broadening and strengthening that law in the way proposed, to reach every kind of rebate and every kind of discrimination, no matter whether between individuals or between localities.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The difficulty is that you thereby correct each rate, one at a time, whereas in the proposed legislation, if it should be perfected, we correct them in a body and to start with, and we fix a place by consulting which every shipper can know his own rate. We do not undertake to say that each rate shall be attacked by a shipper to-day or to-morrow or any other day. We provide for a legislative fixing of rates which is in effect a tax imposed on the business of transportation. A standard being fixed, the carrier knows to what it must conform. The individual rate payer and shipper is not compelled to antagonize the railroad by suing for the recovery of the few dollars they take from him wrongfully on each separate occasion. He is protected by public authority when he comes to deal with an institution that exists by public authority. There is no room for saying that because a shipper, without any legislatively established rates, can go into court and get relief against an excessive rate made by the carrier, that the remedy is adequate. We propose introducing an entirely new system. The courts have held that the carrier can be sued to recover excessive charges paid by a shipper, and in that controversy the question of the reasonableness of rates comes in. It is a judicial question.

Now we introduce a different policy. We propose by public authority to say in advance what the rate shall be. If its reasonableness is questioned, it can be attacked by the shipper before the Commission before it takes effect. It can be attacked by the carrier afterwards by showing that it is confiscatory. The pending legislation contemplates the introduction of a system of rate making by public authority. We have tried the other one long enough. At the present time the railroads understand the game better than the shipper. They are organized into five or six great systems in the United States. They have more power than any one shipper ought to be required to antagonize.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator, I imagine, thinks a valuation of the property is necessary in order that there may be a standard according to which rates may be intelligently made?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. FORAKER. Then, would not the Senator go one step further and have Congress prescribe what would be a just return on that property?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes, sir; I would.

Mr. FORAKER. I think that would necessarily follow.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think that ought to be done, and it is a very serious objection to the pending bill that it does not provide that this shall be done. The distinguished Senator from Ohio has come very near to convincing many Senators that we will not have made a lawful delegation of power to the Interstate Railroad Commission by simply directing that Commission to prescribe rates that shall be just and reasonable. The command of the Supreme Court in such matters is that a delegation of legislative power to an administrative board will be sustained where it appears that Congress has legislated on every aspect of the matter so far as it is reasonably practicable to go, and that the thing or service delegated is the mere application to details of the rules and directions contained in the act. It is contended, and I think with much plausibility and force, that the delegation proposed in this instance is so broad as to amount to turning over to the Commission all the power and discretion that Congress itself has. That Congress has not only not legislated on the subject so far as it is reasonably practicable to do so, but has created no standard nor declared the policy, which as between several might be chosen, by which and upon which the so-called "just and reasonable rates" were to be ascertained by the Commission. The argument along this line of reasoning made by the distinguished Senator from Ohio commends itself very forcibly to me. But as the bill is full of defects, the forecast that its real meaning will be finally fixed by the slow procedure of the courts, is a matter that goes without saying. While settling other disputed questions, this will doubtless not escape attention. But I think Congress should now deal with the matter courageously and comprehensively, settling the basis of valuation and fixing itself the percentage of income which will satisfy the demands of just compensation.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senator is exactly right about it, if that is the kind of standard that he proposes to establish; but I call his attention to the fact that in determining that he will have to go still a step further and determine what shall be allowed for earnings and the betterments of the property, for replacements, for expenses, and for the salaries or wages of employees. It seems to me that is inevitable.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Would not the Commission have to do that anyway without any law directing them to do so?

Mr. FORAKER. I presume they would. I am not suggesting this in any controversial sense. I am only glad to see the Senator has such a broad and intelligent—for it is a broad and intelligent—view of the difficulties of this situation. It seems to me when we once embark upon it there is no end to it, as I have already had occasion to say heretofore.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Supreme Court of the United States has fully determined that and decided that all of these things must be taken into consideration. The Commission can not fix rates until they find out how much the property is worth and what would be a fair return upon its value at the time the same is devoted to the service of the public, and there ought to be a fair return upon it.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator, I trust, will allow me to ask him one other question. I hope he will not think I am doing it except only to get information. What return does the Senator think the railroad ought to be allowed to have?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have said that in Arkansas I would make it 6 per cent, or something like that.

Mr. FORAKER. I remember that Governor Cummins, when he was before our committee, testified that he thought, in view of the fact that as the business in some years was bettetr than in others, the railroads might be allowed to earn as much as 7 per cent.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I should not object seriously to that. In a State like Arkansas, where we do not have all the railroads we want, I should like to have the returns sufficiently large to encourage the building of new lines. But I should want that 6 per cent calculated on the actual value of the property employed, and not on watered stock or fictitious bonds which the companies may issue from time to time. I should demand that this valuation be honestly and intelligently ascertained, after full opportunity to both sides to be heard in the inquiry. On the value of the property thus made I should fix the percentage of income deemed reasonable. I do not think we can expect investors to engage in a business unless there is definite prospect of getting a fair profit out of it. But even on this basis of 6 per cent, which is nominally more than the railroads claim to be now making, as it is said that 4 per cent is the measure of profits derived from the business of transportation, the public would be taxed less than two-thirds the sum paid under existing railroad-made rates. It must not be overlooked that the apparently moderate income of 4 per cent is computed on a valuation of $65,000 per mile, whereas the average actual value of the railways, the entire country considered, does not greatly exceed $25,000 per mile.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to what is the popular belief, at least, as I understand it, that there are some railroads that are worth a great deal more than the aggregate of their stocks and bonds. That, I believe, is true of the Pennsylvania Railroad. It is also true of the Illinois Central Railroad, of the New York and New Haven Railroad, and possibly of some other railroads. Has the Senator thought of what he would allow them? They are now paying 6 per cent to their stockholders, and after paying whatever operating expenses and fixed charges they may have they are devoting the balance to the improvement and extension of their property. What would the Senator do in a case like that? I do not ask this to perplex the Senator, but it perplexes me, and I ask the question in good faith.

WHAT TO DO WHERE RAILROAD VALUE GREATER THAN AMOUNT OF STOCKS AND BONDS.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It does not perplex me for one moment. I would give them that return upon the real value of the property employed in the public service. The amount of bonds and stock certificates outstanding is a circumstance of secondary importance and not at all of controlling influence in fixing the value of the property. The carrier is entitled to just compensation for the use of its property at the time the same is employed in the service of the public. This compensation is to be computed on the basis of the value of the property and at the time employed. The carriers have a right to demand this, and the public must submit to a tax on transportation adequate to this purpose. This return can not be made less to a given carrier because its bond and stock issues are less in nominal amount than the sum of the value of its property employed in the business of public transportation. Nor can the public be taxed in a sum in excess of what is adequate to satisfy the demand for just compensation for the service rendered, computed on the basis of the value of the property of the carriers, and at the time employed in such business, by reason of the fact that a given carrier has outstanding a bond and stock issue for a nominal sum in excess of the value of its property so employed on behalf of the public.

The right and duty to regulate the extent of the tax to be imposed on the business of transportation by the carriers engaged therein is a governmental function, to be exercised with due regard to the interests of both the carrier and the public. The right to regulate the amount of stock and bonds to be issued is, almost necessarily, merely a matter of private contract and arrangement between the railroad corporations and those who invest in the stocks and bonds so issued. The public as a whole have nothing to do with the matter. The carrier corporation has a right to demand just compensation for the use of its property employed in the business of public transportation, computed on the valuation of its property so employed, and at the time so employed, regardless of the amount of its debts, bonded or otherwise, or the number of its shareholders. On the other hand, the business of transportation can not be taxed beyond the limit of what is just compensation, computed in the same way, to supply deficiencies in the income of a carrier whose stock and bond issues exceed in nominal amount the value of the carrier's property so employed in the service of the public. This is the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. It is fortunate for the stockholder who may get 10 per cent on his stock.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all right, provided the public is not taxed any more than it ought to be taxed for the use of the property of such companies.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, If the Senator will not think I am imposing on his good nature, I wish to ask him what he would do with the railroads that are worth more than their stock and earn more than, say, 6 per cent, and what we would do in the case of railroads that do not earn 6 per cent, or 5 per cent, or perhaps do not earn anything?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The latter class should be turned over to somebody who can operate them and make something out of them. That is my answer to that.

Mr. FORAKER. That is not an idle question at all. There are railroads in the country that are not making anything beyond their operating expenses, and yet they are railroads that cost a great deal, but built in the hope that business will develop some time in the future, and that they will ultimately have a profitable return. What would the Senator do in the meanwhile if they raised the rate and drove people off to another line to get them back again?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Of course there are some phases of every question which can not be forecasted definitely, and as to which we can not upon the instant suggest a complete scheme of adjustment, and the case mentioned by the Senator may be one of these. If a railroad was built where one was not needed, where there was no business, and nobody to employ it, I do not know how it would ever get a profit. You will have to settle that to your own satisfaction. Everybody may have a different opinion as to how that might be remedied. Congress can not devise any; and for that reason it does not now present a very serious practical difficulty. If a railroad company intends to occupy a particular field and keep competitors out, and for that reason builds a railroad for such tactical purposes, and from which it does not expect to get any profits except in an indirect way in protecting its system zone assigned to it in a general division of the territory, it might be that it would be able to arrange some scheme by which the stockholders could be taken care of.

Mr. FORAKER. There are a great many railroads, as the Senator is aware, that are built through a country which is not thickly settled, where there is but little business, where there is but small population, which are not, when first opened for business, profitable roads, but losing roads, and as it has been in the past it will doubtless be, though perhaps to a less extent, in the future. A railroad is sometimes improvidently laid out. If it is driven out of business by some other road, it does not need any sympathy; but where people have undertaken to develop a country and reach points that ought to have the benefit of railroads, it seems to me it is one of the troublesome questions that we are now confronted with. The Senator will pardon me, but his frank talk upon the subject and his frank admissions started all these suggestions in my mind. I do not mention them in order to in any way annoy the Senator——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am not annoyed in the slightest.

Mr. FORAKER. Though I have thought of them. I know I could not have annoyed the Senator even if I had wished to. I do it because they are legitimate, and in order that I may in that practical way call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we are embarking in a business that will give us a good many anxious hours if we once get started in it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In nearly every question calling for legislative action situations can be imagined which, should they ever actually arise, would make the law inequitable.

Those exceptional imaginary cases are to be expected to appear in any argument, and the ingenuity of those who antagonize proposed legislation in presenting them is proverbial and is complimented; but they generally do not control. They are very exceptional and enter so slightly into the general affairs of life that they can not deprive others of what is obviously their due simply because they may in an isolated and rare instance fall a victim to an otherwise wholesome law. The Commission has a discretion to take into consideration all of the circumstances that fairly enter into the solution of the problem submitted to its jurisdiction, and I take it for granted that in each one of these cases it will design some feasible remedy having reference to the rights of the carrier and the rights of the public. There may be a situation imagined, or it may be that a railroad may be found, as to which no rate that the traffic could afford to pay would be compensatory. In that event that enterprise would be declared a pecuniary failure and the ordinary laws of trade would govern in its liquidation. The case is exceptional; the remedy must likewise be.

THE DUTY OF CONGRESS NOW.

But I have abused the forbearance of the Senate long enough. I have attempted to show that the evil with which we are dealing is a large one; in fact, constitutes the fundamental perversion of economic laws, dominated by skilled operators and inspired by the avarice-mad spirit of the times, and out of which grows nearly all of the other parasites which so sorely afflict the commercial and industrial interests of the land. A sovereignty must so frame its laws as to attain its ultimate purpose to preserve and perfect itself. The law's aid is the due of the weak and disorganized when their interests are being invaded and their rights are being destroyed by the multiplied power of the few and mighty, bound together by the cohesive incentive of power and profit, and rendered submissive and loyal to a common direction under the conviction that disturbance of their plans is a radical and dishonest assault upon their vested rights. The very magnitude of the evil, and the almost universal extent to which the commercial fabric of this country is now interblended with its ramifications renders legislators conservative, and even restrains them unduly with a sense of hesitation when they stand in the presence of the true proportions of the situation and are confronted with a realization of the consequences which are to follow the application of any real and effective remedy.

Notwithstanding they are advised that the present organized and determined voice of public opinion is addressed to them as a command to put a stop to existing abuses, they stand dismayed, and, yielding to a spirit of indecision, manifest a want of courage in adopting a policy that will effectuate the end desired. The value of caution and conservatism in matters of legislation is never to be underestimated, nor yet must it be overlooked that the beneficiaries of abuse have no more effective weapon in their entire armament when engaged in diverting and defeating efforts to formulate and apply remedies for wrong widely practiced and strongly intrenched. The general prevalence of this spirit must account for the scant and imperfect response that is to be made to the present demand for effective regulation of the transportation business of the country. Nominally the public demand for action has been complied with, but I believe time will show this has been done in a way that will perpetuate the evils complained of, and go no further than to make necessary slight changes in the methods by which these things are done.

I am among those who believe that the better course is to deal comprehensively and courageously with the whole subject. That Congress should take upon itself the responsibility of providing a Commission made up of men possessed of sufficient character and intelligence to invest their official action with the verity and respect due to a tribunal of the highest order; that it should be equipped with all the accessories necessary to enable it to investigate thoroughly and to judge intelligently and impartially; that the law should be so framed as to assume that the Commission would understand that it had no power to invade the constitutional right of the carrier by depriving it of the right to just compensation for the use of its property, to be based and estimated upon the value of that property at the time it is employed on behalf of the public and would act within the limits of its powers; that no presumption should be indulged that the Commission, through ignorance or evil design, would invade this right of the carrier, and that therefore its judgment ought to be permitted to stand until it has been made affirmatively to appear in a judicial tribunal of original jurisdiction that such has been the case. I believe that the right to issue a preliminary injunction has been greatly abused in this country, even when employed as a remedy to restrain the alleged wrongdoing of individuals in their dealings with one another, and I believe that the right to issue such an injunction has no rightful place in any scheme having for its purpose the accomplishment of the thing we have in hand at this time. It is utterly out of place, and an enlightened and comprehensive understanding of the things that it should be our purpose to accomplish will convince anyone that its suspension here will inflict no injustice upon the interest involved.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have notice of one more prepared speech on the pending bill. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] wishes to take the floor to-morrow. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has indicated to me that he wants to make a short speech; but I presume after to-morrow we will not be likely to have any more long speeches. I therefore think that it is now time for us to get an agreement about a vote. So I wish to propose that on the 9th of May—a week from Wednesday—we make final disposition of the bill and all amendments then pending. In order that the Senate may understand the line of disposition of the amendments, I send to the desk a tentative proposal for unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Secretary read the proposed agreement, as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Tuesday, May 1, 1906, general debate shall be concluded upon the bill H. R. 12987, "An act to amend," etc.; that on May 2, and upon the next succeeding legislative days until Wednesday, May 9, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed, under the ten-minute rule, to consider and vote upon amendments that may be offered to the bill; that on Wednesday, May 9, 1906, upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed, without further debate, to vote upon such amendments as may then be pending or as may be offered, and will vote upon the bill itself before adjournment on the said last-named day—May 9, 1906.

Mr. ALDRICH. I see no occasion for agreeing that what is called "general debate" shall cease to-morrow or at any time in the near future. In the first place, we have never in the Senate recognized "general debate." That is a House term. I would suggest that there will probably be no disagreement as to fixing a time for a final vote on the bill for Wednesday, May 9; but I see no reason for making the disposition of time proposed by the Senator from South Carolina, commencing to-morrow or the next day. I imagine that what is called the "general discussion" on this bill is practically closed, and that we may find ourselves in a position where no one will be ready to speak. Certainly the business of the Senate ought not to be delayed by reason of the fact that we have fixed a time for a vote. There is one important appropriation bill now before the Senate, or it will be within a day or two, and I think that we ought simply at this time to fix a time for a final vote, leaving the disposition of matters between now and then to whatever shall be the pleasure of the Senate or whatever is necessary to be done in connection with this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is entirely agreeable to me, Mr. President. My only solicitude has been that if we are going to discuss the amendments, as we doubtless will, and there are some sixty or seventy of them—I have not been able to keep tab on them, they have been coming in so rapidly—I was going to say, unless we can understand that as soon as we have discussed them and any amendment any Senator desires to present and wants to speak on under the ten-minute rule, unless we can kill that amendment then and there or put it in the bill, we will lose time. That is the reason I want three or four or five days for that kind of procedure, because there are some very important amendments pending, and they will take a considerable amount of discussion, and probably will consume all that length of time.

I would say to the Senator from Rhode Island that if there shall appear to be a lapse or a lack of discussion the appropriation bills can always be brought forward. I would have no objection to that. If the Senate will agree to the 9th of May, the intervening time can be disposed of by the Senate to suit itself. I suggest the 9th of May, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Any time that——

Mr. TILLMAN. The voting to begin at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right. I think it ought to be understood, however, that in the time between now and then, whenever there is anyone who wants to speak or there is any disposition to discuss the bill, it should have the right of way.

Mr. TELLER. And all amendments.

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill and all amendments should have the right of way. I would be perfectly willing to have an understanding that on three days of next week—that is, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—up to the time of voting, the discussion should proceed under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest that it be under the fifteen-minute rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well; under the fifteen-minute rule.

Mr. FORAKER. Some of the amendments are very important, and it would be very difficult to present them in fifteen minutes. It may be that during this week all the important amendments can be presented. I want to speak longer than ten minutes on some amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. Does the Senator from Rhode Island consider that Saturday, Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday would be too much time to devote exclusively to amendments?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that three days of next week will be sufficient under a limited rule. They can also be discussed this week.

Mr. TILLMAN. We might meet earlier. We could come here at 10 o'clock, if need be, or at 11 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. It seems to me that the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina, that after to-morrow unlimited debate shall cease, and between that time and the day of voting there shall be an understanding that ten or fifteen minute debates may be indulged in by Senators on amendments, is a good one. I think very likely there will be some amendments that ought to be debated.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am afraid that we will cut off some Senators who desire to speak, like the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, then, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I think we should keep the debate open this week as it is.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Virginia has already given notice of a desire to speak to-morrow, and there is no intention or desire to cut him off or to limit him.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has the floor by courtesy of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply desire to say, for the information of Senators, that I am advised that probably there will yet be several general speeches delivered on this bill, and I think it would be inadvisable to press the request for unanimous consent that the general debate should close on to-morrow. For one, I will speak plainly that I can not consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am perfectly willing to have a vote on Wednesday, the 9th, and let the Senate take care of the intervening time.

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. TILLMAN). That is what you ought to do.

Mr. TILLMAN. All I am after is to get the thing wound up and finished.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is the general sentiment of Senators, I shall not object to it; but I do think there should be a limited time for brief debate upon the amendments. It has been our experience in the past that we have been compelled to vote upon important amendments without an opportunity of having them explained. But I am content with whatever Senators think is the wise thing to do. I want, Mr. President, to have an end to this bill at the earliest possible time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Iowa consent to fifteen-minute debate for all of next week?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly; I will consent to almost anything. I would be willing to close up this matter without further debate. However, if we do not make some arrangement respecting it, we shall occupy the whole of this week in general debate, which I am perfectly willing to consent to; but I think that this bill should be out of the way before we engage in any other extended business.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that it is very important in making this arrangement that we should avoid banking all these amendments to be voted on at the last moment. Then a great many amendments will be brought forward and presented to the Senate when not a word can be said either in opposition to or in favor of them. I think there ought to be a certain number of days allotted to the consideration of and voting on amendments. To bank them all up on the last day, as is now the practice whenever we make a general agreement, I think would be very unfortunate. I like the form of the request of the Senator from South Carolina as he sent it to the desk, though I think if he fixes the date on Thursday and we devote every day of next week to the consideration of amendments it would be better.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it is perfectly apparent that the remainder of this week under general debate will take care of itself in the good discretion of Senators; but in view of the large number of amendments, the very great importance of a large number of those amendments, the desire of Senators to discuss them and of other Senators to hear them discussed, and in view of the fact that we have all spent so much time upon this bill, I suggest that the remainder of this week be devoted, as it is, to general debate on the unfinished business, and that all of next week, beginning with Monday and ending with Saturday, at which time we take the vote——

Mr. GALLINGER and others. Oh, no.

Mr. KEAN. Make it the 9th. Do not put it off another day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So far as I am concerned, I am making the suggestion, and the Senator can object; but it seems to me when we are coming to a final discussion of the amendments themselves, it is more important to add one day or two days than it is to subtract one day or two days.

I think further, Mr. President, that debate under the ten-minute rule upon amendments such as are offered to this bill, is a far too limited debate. There is hardly a Senator here who can discuss one of the amendments as he wishes to discuss it, or as the Senate wishes to hear it discussed, under the ten-minute rule. It ought to be not less than twenty-five minutes. So I suggest, as a basis of modifying what has already been suggested, that the remainder of this week be devoted to general debate and that all of next week be devoted to amendments, to be taken up and discussed under the thirty-minute rule or the fifteen or twenty minute rule, but certainly not under the ten-minute rule, and that they be voted upon as soon as the discussion upon each of them is completed. What does the Senator say to that?

Mr. TILLMAN. I still stick to my original proposition, if I can get the Senate to agree to it, but I am unwilling to go beyond the 9th of May for the final vote. In the meantime the Senate can control everything in its own way. We start in the morning. If there are any set speeches on hand let them be delivered, and if there are no such speeches, some Senator can call up an amendment, and when we get through the discussion of that amendment we can vote on it then and there.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. BAILEY. I was about to suggest that we first agree to vote on the 9th of May. Let that question be settled, and then it will be an easy matter, as soon as the general debate has been exhausted, to take up the amendments and discuss and dispose of them as they always are discussed and disposed of here.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator consent to vote on the 10th and devote three days next week to the amendments?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from South Carolina has that matter in charge. If that is not agreeable, then I suggest that, beginning on Saturday, we take up the amendments, discussing them and disposing of them as we proceed with them, under the fifteen-minute rule. Ten minutes is the usual limit; but, acceding to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], I make the suggestion that the vote be taken on Wednesday, May 9, beginning at 2 o'clock in the afternoon; that beginning on next Saturday morning the amendments be taken up, considered under the fifteen-minute rule, and disposed of as they are considered.

Mr. ALLISON. Does that mean that during all of next week the amendments shall be disposed of as they are reached?

Mr. BAILEY. As they are reached.

Mr. ALLISON. Under the fifteen-minute rule?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, if the Senator will allow me to make one other suggestion, there should be, it seems to me, some rule as respects amendments. There are forty or fifty amendments pending to the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Sixty-odd.

Mr. ALLISON. Sixty-odd——

Mr. TELLER. Seventy.

Mr. ALLISON. Seventy, we will say, and I do not know how many more that are to be projected later. I think the wisest way to dispose of these amendments will be to take up the bill by sections in their order, and dispose of the amendments to each particular section. Otherwise we shall have a scramble here about amendments and confusion that will occupy time that ought to be occupied in intelligent debate.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is an excellent suggestion; but we, of course, must have it understood that if we reach 2 o'clock without having disposed of the amendments, they will then be still subject to a vote. That will give every Senator a vote upon his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] a moment ago is, I understand, exactly in conformity with the parliamentary law that controls bills before this body. The pending bill was reported here without any amendments having been suggested to it by the committee. Therefore there is no preference to be given to one amendment over another in respect to the time of its consideration.

The parliamentary law, as I understand it, Mr. President, the universal usage in the parliamentary bodies of England and the United States, is that a bill, after it has been read, shall be taken up by sections for amendment, and each section passed upon, and the amendments thereto discussed, considered, and voted upon. I am perfectly willing that that rule shall be observed so far as I am concerned. That, of course, terminates general debate, as we call it, whenever we agree to take up the bill for amendment, read the sections from first to last consecutively, and call for amendments to each section as it is reached. That will terminate the general debate. Then, if Senators want a limitation upon the time for the discussion of the amendments, respectively, as they are presented, the Senate can agree upon that, of course.

But I venture to suggest that when we have a motion to lay on the table, which cuts off debate, that it is quite easy to dispose of all amendments by that motion. If they are laid on the table, they are ended, and if they are kept up for consideration by refusal to lay on the table then we understand that that is an important matter upon which a vote by yeas and nays is going to be taken. I think there is ample power in the Senate in the use of that motion to control the time upon the discussion of amendments, and it ought to be freely resorted to. No Senator ought to feel at all discommoded or sensitive because another Senator chooses to try to bring debate to a close by a motion to lay on the table. If we go at it in that way, the only thing, it seems to me, that is necessary to be done is to recognize that rule and to agree on a day when we will take up the bill to be considered, section by section, with the amendments thereto.

Mr. BACON. We are unable to hear the Senator from Alabama, and we would like to very much, because he is proposing what we will have to agree to or disagree to.

Mr. MORGAN. I was merely suggesting, I will say to the Senator from Georgia, that I am perfectly willing to fix a day—I do not care when it is; to-morrow, so far as I am personally concerned—when the bill shall be taken up and be read by sections for amendment; each section read and disposed of, with all the amendments pending or that may be offered to it; get through with that, and go on to the next. That will bring the conclusion of this debate very much sooner than we can reach it by any agreement we may make here, because I would not consent to naming to-day a day when the final vote on this bill shall be taken.

I believe a final vote will be reached earlier if we pursue the course suggested by the Senator from Iowa than in any other way we may possibly deal with this matter. Therefore I may be considered to be here as objecting to fixing a day for a final vote on this bill. The final vote will come when the amendments are disposed of.

Mr. ALDRICH. This discussion has shown the wisdom of the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY], that we first agree upon a time for taking the final vote, and then let us see if we can agree upon the details as to what shall be done between now and then.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall object.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will confine his present request to asking that a day be fixed for a final vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. Very well. I ask unanimous consent that Thursday, the 10th, be fixed as the day when we shall take a final vote on it.

Mr. MORGAN. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly obvious that the agreement on the amendments must go with the agreement on the final vote. Can we not agree that on Monday next we will take up the bill, to be read section by section for amendment, the debate to proceed under the fifteen-minute rule, and that on Thursday, at 2 o'clock, the final vote be taken on the bill and all amendments still remaining or to be offered?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am quite agreeable to the fixing of any date Senators may desire. I am willing that it shall be either the 9th or the 10th. I think, however, from what we have seen heretofore when a definite hour has been fixed for voting on an important measure, that it is better simply to fix the day instead of fixing the hour. I do not say this because of any disposition to delay the vote. I am willing to agree to that day or an earlier day. I think it would be better to fix simply the day, and say we will vote on that day. Senators will all recollect the fact that when we have had important legislation here, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, in the last moment amendments are crowded in, and even after the voting has begun amendments are offered, and Senators are required to vote yea or nay without being able to state the reasons which actuate them in the giving of that vote. I do not know what amendments are going to be offered. There are some as to which, if they are offered, I desire to be able to state the reason why I shall vote one way or the other.

Mr. LODGE. Under my proposition and under the proposition of the Senator from South Carolina there would be three days for that purpose. The Senator from South Carolina proposed a week.

Mr. TILLMAN. This week and all of next week, up to the day of voting.

Mr. LODGE. I propose three entire days to take up and dispose of amendments, and we ought to reach 2 o'clock on Thursday with the amendments pretty thoroughly disposed of.

Mr. BACON. The Senator also proposed, if I understood him correctly, that at 2 o'clock we proceed to vote upon the amendments offered and to be offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. That has to be there.

Mr. LODGE. That has to be in, of course.

Mr. BACON. That is the reason why we should have a day rather than an hour fixed.

Mr. LODGE. We are to have three days not only to discuss, but to dispose of amendments, and by that time we shall have disposed of most of them. And, moreover, I think it would be very unfortunate not to fix an hour, because that may drag it out a day or two with recesses.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. The Senator says we will have three days in which to dispose of amendments. Those three days will certainly not be devoted to the consideration and discussion of amendments offered after 2 o'clock on Thursday, if 2 o'clock is the hour fixed for a vote. And for that reason I think it would be better not to fix an hour. I think by having several days devoted to the consideration of amendments, most of the subjects upon which amendments will be offered will have been very fully discussed, and possibly there may not be many amendments thereafter offered.

Mr. LODGE. But we are to vote all through those three days.

Mr. BACON. That is true; and for that reason there will be very little left to offer amendments upon or to discuss after 2 o'clock on Thursday, but it may be very important that it should be done.

Mr. TILLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. HALE. May I ask the Senator how he proposes to take up the time, on the last suggested proposition, for the rest of the week, between now and Saturday? How many reluctant Senators has he on his list who desire to be heard?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have heard of only two. It seems it is almost impossible to get a unanimous-consent agreement, though I am going to try once more, and then I will notify the Senate as to what my plan will be.

I again ask unanimous consent that we take the final vote on this bill and all amendments pending thereto or to be offered on Thursday, the 10th of May, beginning at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to fix any day anybody may name for taking up this bill and considering it by sections for amendment, but I will not consent to fixing a day for a final vote on the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama objects.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator has a right to object, and therefore I recognize my duty, and that is to notify the Senate that every hour, after the morning business is over, I am going to keep this bill before the Senate, if the Senate will back me in that, and I will keep it there until we get a vote on it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is all right.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can do that; and the only way is to ask that the Senate proceed to vote on whatever amendment is pending, if no Senator is ready to go on and speak. The Senator has found a solution of this whole business.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will try to get unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator wait a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator, when this bill comes up, will see whether any Senator desires to go on and debate it in his own way, which we can not restrain—we never have—and if nobody is ready, the Senator will then invoke the assistance of the presiding officer and ask what amendment is pending, and push the matter to a vote, he will soon be out of the woods.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to ask now for unanimous consent that whenever this bill is before the Senate and any amendment is offered we shall vote on that amendment as soon as we have discussed it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not need to ask that.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; but I want to get an agreement on that, because some man may turn in and go to speaking by the hour in order to kill time.

Mr. HALE. That you can never hinder. But if the Senator will insist, when the time comes and the bill is before the Senate, that either some Senator shall go on and debate it in his own way or that the Senate shall vote upon the pending amendment, I say he will soon be out of the woods.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have already given notice that that is my purpose after to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON. I want to suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that the next parliamentary stage of this bill is to read it for amendment. It has not been read for amendment, and the next step is to call it up and have it read for the purpose of amending it in Committee of the Whole. If the Senator follows that step, we can take up these amendments one by one and dispose of them.

Mr. TILLMAN. As they are offered.

Mr. NELSON. As they are offered.

Mr. FRYE. Why can it not be agreed that whenever the amendments are reached for consideration the debate on the amendments shall be under the ten or the fifteen minute rule?

Mr. TILLMAN. I would be glad to get an agreement to that effect.

Mr. FRYE. Can you not get that?

Mr. TILLMAN. I will try.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that possibly it might be well to modify the request so as to give the proponent of an amendment a little more time than other Senators who may wish to discuss the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never found that any man who had anything to say here could not get all the time he wanted. It is only when he is long-winded and is full of words without ideas that people do not want to hear him.

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator is correct, but his suggestion can not be applicable to me.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am not applying it to anyone. The Senator is too thin skinned if he applies that to himself, because he gives us a great deal of pleasure when he speaks.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from South Carolina is indulging in euphemisms, as he usually does. Nevertheless, I want to say what I was about to say when the Senator interrupted me, that whatever may be the disposition of the Senate to give to an interesting speaker all the time he desires, if there is a unanimous-consent agreement that debate shall be limited to fifteen minutes that desire on the part of the Senate could not be gratified.

Mr. TILLMAN. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BACON. We do not ingraft one unanimous-consent agreement upon another unanimous-consent agreement. When we make a unanimous-consent agreement, it is considered in the Senate as the most binding of all proceedings and is most scrupulously regarded by all Senators as something the binding force of which may not thereafter be called in question by any subsequent occurrence or occasion. While, of course, I will not press the suggestion at all, and I do not know that I should avail myself of it, even if the proposed unanimous-consent agreement should be modified, it does look as if possibly there might be some propriety in the suggestion that the proponent of an amendment might require a little more time to properly present it to the Senate than those of us who might desire to follow him in the discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. If it is the desire of the Senate to give the mover of an amendment longer time than anyone else, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. BACON. Only for the original presentation of it. I do not mean in the subsequent discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not believe the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. FRYE. Have we not had amendments pretty thoroughly discussed already during this debate, and if we are ever going to be familiar with the rate bill is it not possible that we may be reasonably familiar with it by this time? I hope the Senator will ask unanimous consent that a day be fixed on which to start with the amendments, because every Senator desires to be here when the amendments are under consideration. Suppose the Senator asks that next Friday or next Saturday or next Monday——

Mr. TILLMAN. I will make another effort to get unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday——

Mr. FRYE. What?

Mr. TILLMAN. That on Wednesday, the coming Wednesday, day after to-morrow——

Mr. FRYE. That is first rate.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senate proceed to the consideration of amendments to this bill.

Mr. FRYE. Under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. Under the fifteen-minute rule.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I stated a while ago to the Senator from South Carolina that I was advised that some Senators desire to speak longer on the general bill than fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will say Friday.

Mr. CULBERSON. Wednesday is too early.

Mr. FRYE. Make it Monday.

Mr. LODGE. Make it Monday.

Mr. FRYE. Make it next Monday.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will try Friday. I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next the Senate will proceed to the consideration of this bill, taking up the amendments as they are offered and disposing of them after discussion under the fifteen-minute rule.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that the suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is the proper one, that the bill be taken up in its regular parliamentary stage.

Mr. ALLISON. By sections.

Mr. BACON. By sections rather than that amendments should be disposed of as offered.

Mr. TILLMAN. There are so many cooks that I can not keep up with the suggestions as to where to put the pepper and the salt, but I will agree to anything the Senate will agree to.

Mr. ALDRICH. Two or three suggestions have been made, one by the Senator from Georgia and another by the Senator from Iowa, that we take up the bill in proper order. The custom of the Senate is that when a bill is reported it is read for amendments. The committee amendments are acted upon first. If there are no committee amendments, as there are none in this case, amendments are offered to the bill generally. Of course you can not preclude a Senator from offering an amendment to the first section after all the sections have been read. Amendments are not only in order after that time, but they are in order in the Senate. That has been the parliamentary rule.

So I see no particular value in the suggestion that we agree to follow that course—that is, that after the bill has been read through, section by section, any amendment shall be in order to any section of the bill, and that when one is offered to the first section and is disposed of, we will, in like manner, go through the whole twenty sections, or whatever number of sections there are, and after the twentieth section has been disposed of any Senator may offer an amendment to the first section. I can see no particular good in getting an agreement of that kind because that is the course which we would necessarily follow.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that there being sixty or seventy amendments unless we proceed reasonably in order it will take a long time. Of course a Senator can withhold his amendment until we get through with the reading of the bill for amendment, and amendments can be offered to the bill in the Senate. But my suggestion was for an orderly proceeding, not that I sought in any way to cut off anyone. That I know could not be done, and there is no disposition to do it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to taking up the bill by sections, and disposing of as many amendments as possible from time to time, understanding all the time that any amendment is in order to the bill, as it always has been under the practice of the Senate and as it is under the rule of the Senate, until the bill is finally passed to a third reading.

Mr. FRYE. An amendment is in order now. An amendment is in order any day and at any hour.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand that. So when we talk about parliamentary practice and the rules of the Senate, they are not very orderly and never have been in the consideration of amendments.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator who has this bill in charge will call it up after to-morrow and pursue the very course he suggested, we will, in my judgment, get through with it within the time which he has endeavored to have fixed for voting. Of course, there are unlimited opportunities here to offer amendments. After we get through all these amendments, somebody may offer another one, if he wants to. I have noticed in the Senate, however, that whenever that is done in a spirit of delay the amendment is pretty apt to go to the table without any further discussion or interference with the business. The Senate has it in its power all the time to hasten this matter, if it desires to do so. Nobody wants to cut off debate. Those who want to debate will have to-morrow and the next day. It seems to me that is time enough. I understand there are only two set speeches to be made. One can be made to-morrow and the other the next day. Then we can take up the bill under the ten or fifteen minute rule.

Mr. TILLMAN. We have not any agreement to any rule yet.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me it is important that all Senators should have due notice of two things—when the final vote is to be taken and when the voting on amendments is to begin. I think there ought to be notice of those two facts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have tried to get an opportunity to do that.

Mr. LODGE. I know the Senator has. I am entirely agreed with his original proposition.

Mr. TELLER. So am I.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] has said that he will object to any request that a day be fixed for a final vote. Therefore that is settled. All I can do is to call on the Senate to take this matter under consideration and have it considered, and if Senators are not ready to talk, we have got to vote.

Mr. LODGE. I misunderstood the Senator from Alabama. I understood him only to object to fixing a time for a final vote without fixing a time for voting on the amendments.

Mr. TELLER and others. No.

Mr. LODGE. If he objects to a final vote, that ends it.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to name a day for taking up the amendments to this bill in the order of the sections, section by section. I am willing to go further and limit the time for debate upon amendments, if you please, to fifteen minutes, but I am not willing to fix a day for a final vote on this bill.

Mr. FRYE. Then why can not the Senator from South Carolina get an agreement that on Monday next the Senate will proceed to consider amendments to this bill in parliamentary order?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is too far off. I want a time sooner than that.

Mr. HALE. Why wait so long?

Mr. FRYE. Try Friday; under the fifteen-minute rule. Those two things can be settled, and we can leave the final vote to further determination.

Mr. HALE. Let me make a suggestion to my colleague. Why wait until Monday?

Mr. FRYE. I have no disposition to wait until Monday. If there is any way to get through with this rate bill, I want to get through with it.

Mr. HALE. Why not to-morrow or the next day?

Mr. TILLMAN. I have tried for unanimous consent and have not been able to obtain it. I now renew my notice that I shall try to get this bill up after the routine morning business and hold it before the Senate, and Senators will have to speak or vote.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe the Senator from South Carolina can get an agreement that next Friday morning we shall take up this bill, to be read by sections; that as each section is read amendments to that section shall be in order, and that each amendment shall be subject to consideration under the fifteen-minute rule, and when considered shall be disposed of. I believe the Senator can get that.

Mr. FRYE. So do I.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will ask unanimous consent for that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the request of the Senator from South Carolina for unanimous consent.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Friday, May 4, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 12987, the bill to be read by sections for the purpose of amendment, the discussion upon amendments to proceed under the fifteen-minute rule——

Mr. TILLMAN. And amendments to be disposed of when the discussion closes.

The Secretary read as follows:

The amendments to be disposed of when the discussion thereon is concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not object, but I want to understand the import of this proposition. I understand it to be that beginning Friday morning the debate upon this bill shall be limited to fifteen minutes.

Mr. TELLER. That is it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is it.

Mr. ALLISON. That general debate shall close on Friday morning.

Mr. MORGAN. That is the effect of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thursday night.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Carolina? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MALLORY. There seems to be some difference of opinion as to when this shall begin. I should like to be advised on that point.

Mr. TILLMAN. It starts Friday morning immediately after the routine morning business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Friday morning at the conclusion of the routine morning business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 1, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate April 30, 1906.

MARSHAL.

Milo D. Campbell, of Michigan, to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Michigan.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 30, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MOORE, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

Mr. MILLER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

APPOINTMENT OF MANAGERS FOR SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 145, for the appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Charles M. Anderson, of Ohio; WILLIAM WARNER, of Missouri; Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, and JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, be, and the same hereby are, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States; Charles M. Anderson, WILLIAM WARNER, and Franklin Murphy to succeed themselves, their terms of service expiring April 21, 1906; JAMES W. WADSWORTH to succeed Gen. Martin T. McMahon, deceased, whose term of office expires April 21, 1910.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GEN. HORACE PORTER.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, extending the thanks of Congress to Gen. Horace Porter.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That the thanks of the people of the United States are justly due and are hereby tendered to Gen. Horace Porter, late ambassador to France, for the disinterested and patriotic services in conducting upon his own initiative and at his own expense a series of researches and excavations extending over a period of six years, and resulting in the recovery of the body of Admiral John Paul Jones from a forgotten grave in a foreign land and its return to the country which he had loved so well and so heroically served.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to amend that by adding a further resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Gen. Horace Porter be requested to furnish Congress a copy of his remarks at the exercises at Annapolis, April 24, 1906, and that, when received, said remarks be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to object to this. I think it is most appropriate. I had the honor and pleasure of listening to that most chaste and eloquent address of that distinguished gentleman who rendered such service to the country in restoring to the United States the remains of this distinguished naval officer, the founder of the American Navy.

I rise to give my approval to the resolution, to indorse it, and hope that this most chaste and eloquent address may be, when a copy of it is furnished to the House, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or some one, will see to it that it is printed in such a form that it can be distributed to the country, so that every American can have an opportunity to read it.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. OLMSTED. For a question.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Would it not be wise to provide that it be printed as a document?

Mr. OLMSTED. That can be attended to later.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York that if that matter be left to the Committee on Printing, probably they would provide for it being printed in a more useful and ornamental way than it would be if it were printed as a document.

Mr. OLMSTED. I understand that will be attended to by that committee later.

Mr. Speaker, General Porter is the son of a former governor of Pennsylvania. He spent his boyhood days and acquired his early education in Harrisburg and commenced his brilliant career by appointment to the United States Military Academy, at West Point, by one of my predecessors in Congress from that district. Owing to that fact and to my long personal acquaintance with and friendship for him, it affords me unusual pleasure to offer this resolution, and I desire to express my appreciation of the courtesy of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], who, having prepared a similar resolution, kindly gave way in my favor.

Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to take up needlessly the time of the House in the discussion of a resolution for which I am sure every Member intends to vote. But I do desire to add a few words.

Mr. Speaker, whether in the field of arms or in the field of diplomacy General Porter has always deserved well of the American people. It is not too much to say that since the days of Benjamin Franklin we have not been more successfully, effectively, or brilliantly represented at Paris than by him. This resolution, however, deals with a patriotic, unselfish, and an unique service outside the line of official obligation or duty, the history of which is too fresh in our minds to require elaboration.

When on the 14th of June, 1777, Congress unanimously resolved "that the flag of the thirteen United States be thirteen stripes alternate white and red; that the Union be thirteen stars, white in a blue field, representing a new constellation," it declared in the same resolution that Capt. John Paul Jones be appointed to command the ship Ranger, whose guns were shortly to awaken those echoes of glory which shall continue to reverberate around the globe while deeds of valor find commendation in the hearts of men. He was the first to unfurl that flag over an American man-of-war. The first salute of honor ever paid to it by a foreign nation was received by him and the first hostile colors struck to it at sea were surrendered into his hands. The white stars in that field of blue have now increased to forty-five, but never have they shone upon a defender more gallant than John Paul Jones. In the war for American independence he engaged in no less than twenty-three naval battles and never once permitted that flag to be lowered. He would not surrender and he would not be conquered. He made the first successful invasion of the British coast that had been accomplished in five hundred years. His services in behalf of American independence were so distinguished and so successful that he received signal honors from three governments. He died in Paris in 1792. His body was preserved in alcohol in a leaden coffin, hermetically sealed, with the thought that it would be reclaimed by the land he had so wonderfully served and honored. Buried in a little cemetery, owned by the Government as the resting place of foreign Protestants, at a time when the violence of the French Revolution was at its height, his grave was either not permanently marked or the marking was effaced in the disorders of that turbulent time. Eventually the little cemetery itself was filled in with earth and covered with buildings and even its exact location difficult to find. Some of the burial records of the day were destroyed by the Commune, and in one important instance several important leaves were missing which it took years to trace.

Arriving in Paris as our ambassador, General Porter found everywhere marks of the esteem in which Paul Jones was held by the French nation, and was mortified to find that we were looked upon as ungrateful in that his remains had received no attention at our hands. For a period of six years, commencing in 1899, he devoted his time, energy, and money to a search, the story of which reads almost like a romance, resulting in the location of the cemetery, and, after extensive and costly excavations, the discovery of the body itself, whose identification was so absolute and complete as to receive the official indorsement of two nations. An American squadron, under Admiral Sigsbee, was sent to bring it home, and only last week it was laid away at Annapolis with all the honors which a great and grateful nation could bestow.

General Porter's services in this direction have involved a personal outlay of not less than $35,000, for which he has generously and patriotically declined to be reimbursed, and asked that the amount may be added to the proposed cost of the crypt in the chapel at Annapolis in which the remains of John Paul Jones will finally rest. He has measurably relieved this nation from the charge of ingratitude toward one of its earliest and greatest naval defenders.

This resolution involves no expenditure of money; it confers neither rank nor title; it is the simplest possible method of saying to General Porter, on behalf of the American people: "For enabling us to reclaim and do honor to the remains of one whose name and fame are so gracefully and enduringly enwreathed in the folds of our flag, we thank you."

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The joint resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OLMSTED, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DAMS ACROSS COOSA RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. BOWIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15334) to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Coosa River, at Lock 2, Alabama, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask a few questions. As I understand it, navigation in this portion of the river has been entirely abandoned.

Mr. BOWIE. That is my information; yes; and the War Department recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Is it in the gentleman's district?

Mr. BOWIE. Yes; it is in my district. It is a local bill.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWIE] does not intend to advocate any improvement to navigation in that locality?

Mr. BOWIE. Any improvement to navigation?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BOWIE. At this locality? At Lock 2? I do not intend to advocate anything more at Lock 2 than is there already. I simply want this dam across the abandoned portion of the river for the purpose of creating a power.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. There is no navigation there at this time and none is expected.

Mr. BOWIE. There is navigation between Locks 2 and 3.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. BOWIE. Navigation, as the gentleman will remember, extends down to Lock 3.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. But this is below Lock 3.

Mr. BOWIE. No; it is below Lock 2. It is between Locks 2 and 3, and navigation extends to Lock 3, but this dam will be erected in the abandoned portion of the river.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. The gentleman does not intend to ask, nor his constituents, as far as he knows, for any improvement at that point?

Mr. BOWIE. That is right.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the original bill, as I recollect it, said something about constructing a dam across the river. Is it intended by that to construct it clear across the river or just the abandoned portion?

Mr. BOWIE. In the abandoned portion. That is what the bill says.

Mr. BURNETT. Very well. As I understand it, there is an island in the river, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Mr. BOWIE. It is in the abandoned portion of the river.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I would like to understand that more fully. This does not reach across the river?

Mr. BOWIE. No.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. But only to an island.

Mr. BOWIE. It reaches only, according to the bill, across the abandoned portion of the river.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any riparian owner, whether person, company, or corporation, having authority therefor under the laws of the State of Alabama may hereafter erect, maintain, and use a dam or dams in or across the Coosa River, in the State of Alabama, at such points at or near Lock 2 as they may elect and the Secretary of War may approve, between a point on the eastern side of the river in the abandoned portion thereof at a point below the United States Government dam at Lock 2 and above the navigable portion of the river between Locks 2 and 3, for the purpose of erecting, operating, and maintaining power stations and to maintain inlet and outlet races or canals and to make such other improvements on the eastern bank of the Coosa River between the two points above mentioned as may be necessary for the development of water power and the transmission of the same, subject always to the provisions and requirements of this act and to such conditions and stipulations as may be imposed by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War for the protection of navigation and the property and other interests of the United States.

SEC. 2. That detailed plans for the construction and operation of a dam or dams and other appurtenant and necessary works shall be submitted by the person, company, or corporation desiring to construct the same to the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, with a map showing the location of such dam or other structures, with such topographical and hydrographic data as may be necessary for a satisfactory understanding of the same, which must be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War before work can be commenced on said dam or dams or other structures; and after such approval of said plans no deviation whatsoever therefrom shall be made without first obtaining the approval of the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War: Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not interfere with the navigation of the Coosa River: And provided further, That said dam or dams and works shall be limited only to the use of the surplus water of the river, not required for the navigation of the Coosa River, and that no structures shall be built and no operations conducted by those availing themselves of the provisions of this act which shall injure or interfere with the navigation of said river or impair the usefulness of any improvement made by the Government in the interest of navigation.

SEC. 3. That the Government of the United States reserves the right, at any time that the improvement of the navigation of the Coosa River demands it, to construct, maintain, and operate, in connection with any dam or other works built under the provisions of this act, suitable lock or locks or any other structures for navigation purposes, and at all times to control such dam or dams or other structures, and the level of the pool caused by such dam or dams, to such an extent as may be necessary to provide facilities for navigation; and whenever Congress shall authorize the construction of such lock or other structures, the person, company, or corporation owning and controlling such dam or dams or other structures shall convey to the United States, under such terms as Congress shall prescribe, titles to such land as may be required for the use of such lock and approaches, and in addition thereto shall grant to the United States, free of cost, the free use of water power for building and operating such constructions: Provided also, That the person, company, or corporation building, maintaining, or operating any dam or dams or other structures under the provisions of this act shall be liable for any damage that may be inflicted thereby upon private property, either by overflow or otherwise, in a court of competent jurisdiction. The person, company, or corporation owning or operating any such dam shall maintain, at their own expense, such lights and other signals thereon and such fishways as the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall prescribe.

SEC. 4. That all the rights acquired under this act shall cease and be determined if the person, company, or corporation acquiring such rights shall at any time fail to comply with any of the provisions or requirements of this act, or with any of the stipulations that may be prescribed by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, or in case a person, company, or corporation authorized by the laws of the State of Alabama to erect and maintain a dam and improvements as contemplated by this act shall fail to begin the erection of said dam and improvements within two years after being so authorized and shall fail to complete the same within five years after obtaining such authority.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall in no manner interfere with or impair the rights of any person, company, or corporation heretofore authorized by Congress to erect a dam or other structures for the development of water power on the Coosa River.

SEC. 6. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is expressly reserved.

With the following amendment:

On page 4, in line 5, after the word "jurisdiction," add the following:

"Provided further, That any injury or damage to the navigable capacity of the Coosa River or to the works of improvement of the United States in the said river which may result from the construction of the dam and other works herein authorized, or any alteration, enlargement, or change in said works of improvement which may, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, be made necessary by the construction of said dam and other works, shall be made good and completed at once by those availing themselves of the provisions of this act, their executors, successors, and assigns, and failing this, such injury or damage may be remedied, and such alteration, enlargement, or change may be completed by the United States, and the cost of the work so required shall be paid by the grantees, their heirs or assigns, and to secure the payment for any work thus done by the United States a bond, with good and sufficient security, in a sum judged adequate by the Secretary of War for the payment of the cost of said work shall be executed and filed with the Secretary of War before any advantage shall be taken of the provisions of this act."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOWIE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the regular order.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the paragraph last read. I am informed that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is a very extensive and successful farmer of the great State of New York, which he represents with so much distinction upon this floor. He is also, I am glad to state, devoting his energies and his ability and financial resources to some extent in developing the great dairying interests in the district which I have the honor to represent, and I not only welcome him, but I would welcome all others who have energy and ability and financial resources to take advantage of the opportunities which the whole State of Virginia offers for investors. But, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] have formed their opinions in regard to the free-seed distribution from interested sources, taking their opinions, if we are to judge from the RECORD, from the public statements of seed men and the city newspapers. In the RECORD of April 26 I find that the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HENRY] inserted twenty-one extracts from newspapers, most of them city dailies, and many of them decrying the public free-seed distribution, and in the same RECORD there are six pages of small printed matter inserted at the instance of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], giving the views of seed men and city newspapers against the seed provision. In the six pages inserted by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture there are three communications from Peter Henderson & Co., the great seed men of the country, and as many as six extracts from one city newspaper, the Washington Post.

It seems therefore reasonable to assume that the opinions of the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Connecticut are formed from what they have heard from the seed men and from the city newspapers, all, I hold, interested sources. We can not presume that the metropolitan papers have any personal objection to the free-seed distribution, but the fact is that the seed men advertise with them and they are only too glad to do their advertisers a favor in this respect. It comes with poor grace from the metropolitan papers to protest against the expenditure of $200,000 for seed. These papers state that this distribution of seed accounts in part for the deficit in the postal service. Why, sir, it comes with poor grace, I repeat, from those papers to make that statement. When the post-office bill was under consideration it was stated over and over again that the great city papers were responsible in a large measure for this deficit, and that if we could keep the Sunday papers within reasonable limits it would to some extent decrease the postal deficit. Now, Mr. Chairman, I differ with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture in regard to these free seeds. I do not claim that they are essential to the farmer. I do not claim that they are necessary to anybody; but I do say that they are useful to the farming communities in three ways. First, it enables the Department of Agriculture to know what garden seed, flower seed, and other seed furnished should cost. The Department buys the seed in large quantities, and is in communication with the seed men throughout the country, and it has enabled the farmer to ascertain what is a fair price for the seed. In the second place, it enables the Department to do, as is done in some cases, put its finger upon the fraudulent seed dealer and advertise him as such. It enables the Department to say to the country who are the honest dealers and who are the fraudulent dealers. In the third place, it enables the man who does not often go to the city or to the wholesaler—the small farmer, the laboring man who has to depend for his supply of seeds upon what he purchases from the local merchant—to compare the seed he thus buys from the local merchant with the seed that is sent him from the Congressional distribution. The latter is only a sample, but it enables him to make a comparison and see whether a fraud has been perpetrated upon him by the local seed dealer. For these three reasons I think the expenditure is well worth what it costs.

Mr. Chairman, instead of restricting this little concession to the farmer I would enlarge it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I did not catch exactly what the gentleman said, but I understood him to say that certain Members were influenced by clippings from city papers, and I would like in the gentleman's time to insert a letter I have received this morning from the director of our State experimental station——

Mr. RIXEY. You can insert that later on, can you not?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. I would like to put it in at this time.

Mr. RIXEY. I would prefer you would do that later, because I have only five minutes. Mr. Chairman, instead of cutting off this small appropriation I would extend the powers of the Department along this line. I can readily see that this little concession in regard to garden seed is of no use to the gentleman from New York, and I will concede it is of no use to me; it is a burden upon us both, and I believe we get no special thanks from any of our constituents for it; but, sir, I would like to see the principle extended to field seed for experimental purposes. There is great opportunity for imposition in the purchase of grass and field seeds of all kinds. I doubt not that the clover seed purchased by the gentleman from New York costs him annually more than $500. What I buy, and I am to some extent a small farmer, costs me from two hundred to three hundred dollars a year, and I state here that in my opinion in two years out of three it is practically wasted, of no account, and brings no result. And the reason is that, being no judge of the quality of the seed, having no way of telling how old the seed is, whether it will germinate or not, I am frequently deceived, and the expenditure is worse than useless, as the land has to remain idle for another year.

Now, if this principle were extended, if the Department could furnish small samples of clover seed and other field seed, the farmer could make his comparison and he would be enabled to know whether the local seedsmen have sold him worthless seed or not. When we buy seed now that do not come up, we are told that it is due to the season, that it has been too dry, never too wet, perhaps, and other reasons against it. Let us enable the farmer to make these tests and decide whether he had been imposed upon or not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Why do you not send suits of clothes in order that they may compare the price of clothing that they get from the Government and the price of clothes they get elsewhere?

Mr. RIXEY. I have never yet known anyone to desire an opinion as to whether a suit of clothes would cover his nakedness or not, but I have known people who have bought clover seed and did not know whether it would come up until after it was sowed. There is a vast difference between the cases cited.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of talk as to what this seed costs. It costs a mere bagatelle compared with some wasteful extravagances of the Government. I have here on my desk publications which are sent out on various subjects practically every week. There is one called "Results of Primary Triangulations and Primary Traverse;" another "The Drumlins of Southeastern Wisconsin," and another "Weir Experiments, Coefficients, and Formulas." Are such publications of use, and if so, to whom? If anybody wants these documents which are allotted to me he can have them, but I have no seed to give away. If they will curtail the printing of such pamphlets, they will save much more than they will in the seed item. Why, we all know that within the past few years we have been deluged by publications on irrigation subjects. I have not known to whom to send them. I have tried to get rid of them, but they come faster and faster every month, it seems to me. I would say cut down the expenses in the printing line and let this little concession to the farmer remain. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are told that the expenses for agriculture are mounting up. Why, sir, when we compare it with the other appropriation bills it seems almost nothing. Seven million dollars are appropriated for agriculture and industry——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RIXEY. While this bill is under consideration, carrying only seven millions for the great agricultural interests, there is reported to this House the naval bill, carrying one hundred millions. The Army bill has been passed, carrying seventy-five millions; the pension bill carried one hundred and forty millions, and the post-office bill carried one hundred and eighty millions. Why should we object to $7,000,000 for agriculture, the foundation and the very support of this Government, that industry which furnishes more of our exports than any other, that industry which pays more taxes than any other, and the industry which gets less benefit from the Government? This bill carries an appropriation for the dairying interest, and some comment had been made upon it because the chairman of the committee, forsooth, is engaged in dairying. I say here that if the bill carried no appropriation it ought to be amended and that great industry ought to be fostered and encouraged. The bill also carried an appropriation of $60,000 for road purposes—for building experimental roads. I would that that amount were larger. I know of no subject in which the people of this country take a deeper interest than in the subject of the improvement of the roads. I would that the Committee on Agriculture, not content with this appropriation of $60,000, had provided an appropriation whereby national aid could be given to the States whenever they wanted to upbuild and improve their public highways. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, instead of cutting out this little appropriation, admit it is of doubtful value, which I do not believe; but admit that to be true, why is this House called upon to cut off this appropriation and not to cut down expenses in many other points where they are useless and extravagant? [Applause.] It is, sir, because there are interested people who are fighting this appropriation, and their influence has been brought to bear upon the Members of this House to strike it out and keep it out. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement which the gentleman from Virginia has just made—that the press of the country have been influenced by improper motives in opposing the free-seed distribution, and so attempting to influence the House, and that farmers and the general public are not unfavorable to such a distribution—I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a letter received from the director of one of our State experiment stations, expressing his views on free-seed distribution. This gentleman is in close touch with the farmers of Connecticut.

The Clerk read as follows:

STORRS AGRICULTURAL EXPERIMENT STATION,
Storrs, Conn., April 27, 1906.

Hon. E. STEVENS HENRY,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Permit me to congratulate you upon the stand you have taken with reference to free-seed distribution. Your views are entirely right on the matter. The farmers of the country do not wish these free seeds sent to them. The whole business is a laughingstock and the quicker Congress does away with this free distribution of common seeds the better it will be. In my opinion the money could be far better spent in carrying on cooperative experiments with the various experiment stations, rather than in purchasing seeds which can be purchased at every seed store and every grocery store in the country. I congratulate you most heartily.

Yours, very truly, L. A. CLINTON, Director.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Connecticut who the gentleman is whose letter he has just had read?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. He has been a director of one of our State agricultural experiment stations for many years, and is in close touch with the farmers of Connecticut.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Another inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has received any such letters from the farmers of his country.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Yes, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where are they? What do they say about this question?

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Very many of them include resolutions from the local State Grange organization.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I mean the man who toils. The man that drives the horse and works the soil. Have you a letter from him?

Mr. Chairman, I ask the indulgence of the House and committee just a moment, for fear that I may do a possible injustice not only to myself but to Peter Henderson & Co. I have not read very carefully my speech of a day or two ago on this seed question, but in it I said I had not received any communication from my own people protesting against this appropriation. I have not received a single protest from that magnificent agricultural country, one of the finest in the world; and as soon as I learned that this Appropriation Committee had left out this appropriation, in a private conversation, or rather a somewhat private conversation, I said in the presence of one of my home-paper correspondents, that I intended to fight for this free-seed distribution to keep down a seed trust, which I thought would form if we stopped this free-seed distribution. That interview was in part published under a large-lettered head in my home paper—the Nashville Banner, and possibly the Nashville American—yet I have not received a single protest from any man in my district on account of the position I took in the matter. I know that I am right, from my standpoint at least, to thus fight off a seed trust.

I state again that I have made a most careful examination through the books on trusts, and particularly Moody on Truth About Trusts, and found there was no reported seed trust in this valuable work nor in any others I examined, and I then proceeded to get, and did get, a most intelligent and faithful official engaged in investigating trusts, to ascertain if there was in fact an existing seed trust, as I found none reported in these books. After a number of days he said to me that there was no existing seed trust of which he could get any tangible proof. I then asked him if he thought a seed trust would form if we stopped this free distribution of seed. He replied that he thought a seed trust would be formed. He agreed with me that the free distribution of seed has deterred the formation of this trust. He stated also that there was a strong and influential eastern and western association engaged in raising and selling seed.

I repeat, I shall vote to continue this seed distribution to deter the formation of this seed trust, which would put up the price, if it chooses, of both good and bad seed, and thus start again the distribution of bad seed, that the Department, by its operations, has very largely overcome.

I shall continue to vote for this free seed until each and every State shall do what they are not now doing, vigorously enforce their antitrust laws, and until the several States and the Federal Government shall arrest the ravages and lawless actions of the trusts that are now pillaging the rights of the people. So much for this.

I have not read over the speech I delivered here a few days ago on this subject, but for fear that I may have stated that I had received no protest from any person against this free distribution of seed, and desiring to do no one, including myself, any injustice, I wish to state that after I delivered my speech and my day's work was done I returned to my office and asked my very faithful and most intelligent secretary if I had received any protest against this free seed distribution, and I was informed that I had not. To make sure about it we went through from eight to ten boxes of letters which I have received since the beginning of this Congress, and I found only one, and that was a letter, a copy of which you all received, I presume, from Peter Henderson & Co., dated March 22 last, and which I answered on March 23, and I briefly replied thereto:

I shall give this whole matter careful consideration before and on the hearing of the subject before the House.

I shall insert this letter in the RECORD, by permission of the House. It reads as follows:

NEW YORK, March 22, 1906.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We understand from a reliable source that the impression is sought to be created in Congress that the seeds distributed by the Department of Agriculture are better than those sent out by seed houses, and thus a reason is given for the continuance of the practice.

We wish to say that the seed houses were in the business of growing and distributing seeds before the Department, that the Department obtains its supply from the seed houses, and it is therefore difficult to understand how the output can be better. Briefly stated, the method of the seed houses is as follows: They control their own stocks, they keep trial grounds for testing them, they have a clientage that pays for the seed, and if it is not good they hear from it, so that, of necessity, they must see to it that only the best is sent to their customers. In the growing season they send representatives to examine crops and see that they are true to type; in fact, every care that long experience and invested capital can suggest is adopted to safeguard their interests and the interests of their customers.

The Department of Agriculture sends out a circular letter to the seed houses asking for an offer of surplus stock, and if it can not obtain in this way what is wanted we believe a contract is made with a grower for the item or items. We ask, then, in what way can the seeds be better? We submit as a reasonable proposition that the chances are infinitely greater that the stock sent out by seedsmen is the better of the two.

We take the liberty of sending this statement to you because of the underhand, vicious attack which is made upon what is the cornerstone of our business, i. e., our reputation, and it shows to what ends some one is willing to go in an effort to continue the free distribution of seeds by the Government.

Yours, very truly, PETER HENDERSON & Co.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask the indulgence of the committee a little further, because I do not want to do anybody possibly an injustice, particularly a stranger.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The first paragraph of this letter states that there "is an impression sought to be created in Congress that the seeds distributed by the Department of Agriculture are better than those sent out by seed houses." Hence, Mr. Chairman, Mr. Henderson argues, free-seed distribution should not continue.

On page 233 of these hearings, in speaking of adulterated seed, Mr. Galloway repudiates the idea that these seed men sell fresh seed, and contends that "it is the general practice to blend the seed." He says:

It is not only the general practice to blend seed, but there are all sorts of apparatus and devices that have for their object the rejuvenation of seed—that is, polishing devices that make the old seed look bright. There are certain devices that will rub the dust off, etc.

On pages 196 to 200 is a list of seed men who were caught by the Department selling, contrary to the Trimble law prohibiting the adulteration of seed, and I shall insert what Doctor Galloway and the Department say on that subject, so that we can see how these seed men, who are now fighting—at least a part of them—the free-seed distribution, are not only defying the Department and the law, but are imposing upon the farmers of this country.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WADSWORTH). I will now, with the permission of the committee, direct that those lists go into the record. I hear no objection, and you will hand it to the stenographer and let it be put in the record.

The papers referred to are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 23, 1906.

In carrying out the clause in the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture directing the Secretary of Agriculture to obtain samples of seed in the open market and to publish the results of the tests of samples found to be adulterated, about 1,250 samples were obtained from seedsmen in the open market by agents of this Department. These have been examined for adulterants, with the result that the following number of samples were found to be adulterated:

Red clover	3
Alfalfa	42
Orchard grass	133
Kentucky blue grass	43

ADULTERATION OF ALFALFA SEED.

The act of Congress making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, contains the following item:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to obtain in the open market samples of seeds of grass, clover, or alfalfa, test the same, and if any such seeds are found to be adulterated or misbranded, or any seeds of Canada blue grass (Poa compressa) are obtained under any other name than Canada blue grass or Poa compressa, to publish the results of the tests, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale."

Under date of May 25, 1904, a circular letter announcing that the collection and testing of seeds, as directed by this act, would begin July 1, 1904, was sent to the seedsmen of the United States whose names appear in the 1904 edition of "The American Florist Company's Directory of Florists, Nurserymen, and Seedsmen of the United States and Canada," and to wholesale seedsmen whose names are not included in that directory. A copy of the circular sent to the Florists' Exchange was published by that journal in its issue of June 18, 1904.

In carrying out the provisions of the act quoted above, in so far as it relates to alfalfa, offerings for sale were solicited through agents of this Department from 742 seedsmen. Upon examination of the samples of alfalfa seed obtained in the open market as a result of these negotiations 23 lots were found to be adulterated, as shown in the following table:

The Department takes this occasion to call attention again to its offer, repeatedly made in official publications, in circulars sent to seedsmen, and in announcements through the agricultural press, to test and report upon samples of seeds sent for that purpose by any farmer or seedsman.

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 29, 1904.

[United States Department of Agriculture, office of the Secretary.—Circular No. 14.]

ADULTERATION OF ALFALFA AND RED CLOVER SEED.

Seeds of alfalfa and red clover have been obtained and tested in accordance with the following paragraph contained in the act of Congress making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to obtain in the open market samples of seeds of grass, clover, or alfalfa, test the same, and if any such seeds are found to be adulterated or misbranded, or any seeds of Canada blue grass (Poa compressa) are obtained under any other name than Canada blue grass or Poa compressa, to publish the results of the test, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale."

In carrying out the provisions of this act 1,272 seedsmen were asked by special agents of this Department for samples of red clover and alfalfa seed, as offered for sale by them. From these seedsmen 658 samples were obtained and examined. As a result the following lots were purchased in the open market and found to be adulterated. In accordance with the mandatory nature of the act quoted above, publication is here made of the names and addresses of the seedsmen who sold the lots found to be adulterated, together with the percentages of adulteration in each lot.

In order to aid seedsmen in avoiding the purchase of adulterated seeds, this Department will examine and report promptly as to the presence of adulterants in any samples of seed submitted for that purpose.

JAMES WILSON,
Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. FIELD. Doctor, in what variety of seed do you find the highest percentage of adulteration?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Alfalfa seed, usually; and also in the Kentucky blue-grass seed. About 700,000 pounds of Canadian blue-grass seed was brought in this last year——

The CHAIRMAN. Who is the guiltiest party in selling that blue-grass seed? Have you a record there?

Mr. GALLOWAY. The circular on the blue-grass seed is just being prepared now. The two I have here pertain to clovers and alfalfas only.

Mr. SCOTT. The Kentucky blue-grass seed is usually adulterated with an inferior blue-grass seed, is it?

Mr. GALLOWAY. With the Canadian blue-grass seed, which is worthless for planting in this country.

Mr. SCOTT. How about alfalfa?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Alfalfa is adulterated with yellow-trefoil seed, which is also a worthless plant in this country. It is a little, yellow thing that grows on the ground.

Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly plain that the Secretary of Agriculture is not only finding out those who are mixing and selling adulterated seed, but he actually causes to be raised, under his supervision, and tested some of the seed we send out that are the very best that he can have raised, but he also states, through Doctor Galloway, that the seeds which he purchases are "tested" by his Department before they are purchased and sent out, and in this way the farmers are procuring the very best seed possible. You will find all this, gentlemen, referred to in the hearings. At pages 232 to 235 this appears:

Mr. GALLOWAY. I can make a statement now; yes.

I want to say that of the 477 members—and I come in contact with nearly all of them in one way or another at some time—this is the first statement of that kind that has been made—that is, that there are more complaints about the worthlessness of the seed than there are about the goodness of it; because I do not see how anyone who took the ordinary precautions with the seed we send out could help from getting results. We send out seed that must necessarily be better than the ordinary seed that the seedsmen can secure.

Mr. SCOTT. Why?

Mr. GALLOWAY. For the reason that we buy our seed in this way: In the first place, a considerable portion of the seed is grown for us out of what we call our own stock. We know the full history of the stock. We get, for example, a pound of lettuce seed of a high quality, and it is true to name. We can take that pound of lettuce seed and turn it over to a reliable man in California and get 100 pounds that is absolutely true to stock, and in order to make it true we send a man into the field where that lettuce seed is grown and have him rove the field—that is, we eliminate all of the lettuce before the seed have gotten away from the desirable characters. We have for that work a man who has had more experience than any other man in the United States—Mr. W. W. Tracy, sr. His special business is to keep track of our stock. That is the stock we start with. That is done for the greater portion of our seed, and the other we buy out of stock or in the open market under these conditions: We buy to-day, for example, a lot of onion seed. That onion seed, we provide in the contract, must not only be true to name, but must have a certain standard of vitality. It is sent here, and more or less of it is tested in our laboratory, and if it does not come up to our standard it is rejected.

If it is found it is not true to name—and we can only determine that after our field tests are made the following summer—we always withhold a certain amount of pay to cover that; but then during the following summer we make field tests at the Arlington farm and six or seven other places, in cooperation with the experiment stations, of all the seed that enters into the Congressional distribution. We test it for vitality in the laboratory, and we test it for trueness to name in the field.

Mr. SCOTT. Where is your seed grown?

Mr. GALLOWAY. The seed is grown all over the United States.

Mr. SCOTT. Do you make contracts in advance—that is, a year in advance?

Mr. GALLOWAY. We must do that. We are now making provision for the seed for next year. We have to do that in order to be perfectly safe; otherwise we could not secure the seed. We buy all the seed we can in the open market—that is, seed that is now available. We secure it now and have it delivered next August or September; but when it is delivered it must come up to these standards.

Mr. CANDLER. All of them are tested?

Mr. GALLOWAY. All of them are tested.

Mr. CANDLER. Every one when they come in?

Mr. GALLOWAY. When they come in.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it possible to require bids or in any way introduce the element of competition?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes; we do that as far as we possibly can. For instance, we want 40,000 pounds of lettuce seed of a certain variety, and we know pretty well the men who can furnish that seed at different places in the Pacific coast region. We send each of those men a blank form and ask him to submit a proposal for that seed. They come in at a certain time, and unless there is some special reason we will give it to the man whose figures are the lowest, considering freight rates. Very frequently a bid on lettuce seed from, say, Chicago, although it might be a lower bid, would cost us more than if the bid came from some other section on account of freight rates. We have to consider those things.

Mr. FIELD. Doctor, the common impression is that dealers, such as Landreth and others, destroy all the old stock, so that each year they offer to the public fresh seed. Is that true?

Mr. CANDLER. Landreth does claim he destroys all the seed left over.

Mr. GALLOWAY. I can not speak for any particular firm, but it is the general practice to blend seed. It is not only the general practice to blend seed, but there are all sorts of apparatus and devices that have for their object the rejuvenation of seed—that is, polishing devices that make the old seed look bright. There are certain devices that will rub the dust off. There are certain cases where, if they do not want seed to grow very well (where we get imported seed), they run them over hot plates to destroy some of the vitality. It is an object sometimes to have the seed, especially high-grade seed, low in vitality, the main object being to keep up the price.

The CHAIRMAN. That is why I asked the question about corn. I suppose if you kiln-dried it the heat would destroy some of its vitality.

Mr. FIELD. Are the seed that are not distributed one year by the Government used the next year for distribution?

Mr. GALLOWAY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How about that, Doctor? How is it about kiln-dried corn? You say in regard to other seed it does destroy vitality.

Mr. GALLOWAY. It is the pushing of the drying up beyond a certain point. If you dry out corn beyond a certain moisture—beyond a certain percentage—you will destroy the vitality; but if you take out some of the excessive moisture you really improve the corn. It will germinate quicker.

The CHAIRMAN. This corn you have here has not been subjected to kiln drying?

Mr. GALLOWAY. No. The only drying this corn has had is what it has received in my office, where it has been for some time.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you think it is a good corn to plant?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENRY. Is this a hybrid corn?

Mr. GALLOWAY. No; that is the Boone County white.

Mr. HENRY. Do you know how long that takes to mature?

Mr. GALLOWAY. This corn was grown in Ohio. It is not a quick-maturing corn.

Mr. HENRY. One hundred and twenty days?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Something like that. We have quicker maturing corn. I think this corn would mature up in New York.

Mr. CANDLER. You said, a few minutes ago, that the seed left over, if there was any left over, were not sent out the following year.

Mr. GALLOWAY. There has never been any such miraculous happening as any seed being left over.

Mr. CANDLER. Then there is nothing sent out but fresh seed, and those have been thoroughly tested and found to be true to their type?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes; and good in vitality.

Mr. CANDLER. So that they ought to be the very best seed that are sent out.

Mr. GALLOWAY. Under the old practices, before the Department got its own seed, it was the custom to run in poor seed. We could not avoid it. For instance, we made a contract with one man to furnish the seed and do all the work connected with the package, and we specified in the contract that he should furnish certain varieties. When he got along in the busy season, such as it is now—putting up three or four hundred thousand packages a day—he would come in with the statement: "We can't furnish the red Valentine bean. We haven't been able to secure it anywhere. Would not some other variety do just as well?" He would say, "I can't get anything but this other variety," and we would have to take it or let the bean drop out.

Mr. CANDLER. What course do you pursue in order to prevent that?

Mr. GALLOWAY. By taking things forehanded we can make provision all along the line. We have right now enough seed for next year's distribution.

Mr. CANDLER. When the seed come in and you test them and find they do not come up to the standard and are not true to type, what course do you pursue in reference to those seed?

Mr. GALLOWAY. The man who agreed to furnish that seed must take them away. That is, we test in part on the sample and then we test when they come in.

Mr. CANDLER. You do not use them at all?

Mr. GALLOWAY. No.

Mr. CANDLER. Is there any penalty in the contract so that you can require him to come up to it?

Mr. GALLOWAY. The only penalty is we do not take the seed. Under the old practices, when the contractor furnished everything, there was a sliding scale of so many dollars for so many points off. If corn only germinated at 90 per cent instead of 98, we dropped off so many cents for each bushel of corn furnished; but we found that impracticable.

Mr. CANDLER. So that now you just absolutely reject the seed?

Mr. GALLOWAY. We are our own masters now.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment being considered as withdrawn, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of Agriculture, $8,000; Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, $4,500; and the Assistant Secretary is hereby authorized to perform such duties in the conduct of the business of the Department of Agriculture as may be assigned by the Secretary of Agriculture; chief clerk, $2,500; one solicitor, $2,500; private secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture, $2,500; stenographer and execu-

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In view of the doubt that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] expressed of my ability to furnish letters from farmers or granges, I wish to send to the Clerk's desk and have read very brief resolutions showing the action taken by a local grange in my district on this subject. These are typical of numerous letters and resolutions recently received.

The Clerk read as follows:

ELLINGTON GRANGE,
Ellington, Conn., April 24, 1906.

Hon. E. S. HENRY,
Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of Ellington Grange, No. 46, held March 28, your position on the free-seed question was heartily indorsed by all present.

Very truly, yours,

J. M. MARKS, Secretary.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in reference to this question of free seeds, and I do not wish to say them merely for home consumption or for buncombe, but because I believe the policy of sending out free seeds is a just and a wise one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I suggest to the gentleman that he withhold his remarks until we reach the paragraph of plant industry, under which the free seeds will be considered?

Mr. BURNETT. I should be very glad to accommodate the gentleman, but I fear I shall never be seen or recognized by the Chair when that paragraph is reached and prefer to go on now. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I have just stated, the remarks which I wish to make are not for home consumption only, or for buncombe. Gentlemen are mistaken when they state that no good results come from the distribution of these seed. The seed men are trying to impose upon us in every way they can, and they have evidently imposed upon the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. In the RECORD of last Thursday the chairman of that committee obtained unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as a part of his remarks a list of the newspapers and national granges protesting against the free distribution of seeds. The matter asked to be inserted the Chairman no doubt in good faith thought to be of the character indicated by him, and yet we find among the very first articles inserted three letters from one seed house, and quite a number from other seed houses.

The gentleman possibly thought he was inserting extracts from newspapers and resolutions of granges only, but he has been imposed upon by the very people who are now seeking to impose upon this House, and he has inserted a lot of advertisements of seed men. One of them I call attention to is a letter from Peter Henderson & Co., of March 31, 1906, in which they make an attack upon the Secretary of Agriculture. They quote the following from a letter of a Congressman: "So soon as the Agricultural Department has driven seed men to furnishing good seeds—that is to say, seeds that will grow—there will be no further occasion for a continuance of this gratuity." "These," Henderson's letter says, "are the sentiments of the honorable Secretary of Agriculture repeatedly expressed recently; they are couched in almost the same language that he has used. Privately, to one seedsman, he took the opposite side."

Further on in this letter Henderson & Co. say: "The vegetables on sale in every market in the country, the flowers grown by florists which are raised from seeds, the crops grown by the seed growers, the gardens of the critical amateurs, all refute in the strongest way possible the insinuations of the Secretary of Agriculture relative to the quality of the seeds sent out by the seedsmen."

So the gentleman has inserted here an attack upon the Secretary of Agriculture made by the seed men and given a quasi indorsement to it by inserting it in the RECORD.

Mr. Chairman, there is more in this statement of the Congressman and the Secretary of Agriculture, perhaps, than appears on the outside. It shows that it is one of the purposes and objects and effects of this free-seed distribution to force the seed men to furnish good seed. That has been adverted to by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, and I desire to call further attention to it. There are only about $200,000 expended in this appropriation, and there are only a few million packages of free seed sent out. Now, with these great seed men expending their millions, can it be possible that this small number of free seed really comes in competition with the seed men? Is that the real reason of their opposition to this proposition? Is it that the Government comes in competition with them? Is not there behind it a sinister reason—that is, the fear that the Government, by the very seed that they examine and purchase from the seed men, will detect the wrongs that they are perpetrating on the people, and isn't that the real reason that they are making this strenuous opposition? As has been stated by the gentleman who preceded me, let them show letters from the men who till the soil, the small farmers and the small gardeners of this country, objecting to it. A chairman of the National Grange, who, perhaps, works a hundred men and knows nothing about the practical operation of it, may not want them, and a professor in some agricultural college, who sits in an easy chair and talks about the theory of farming, perhaps will not want them, but you go with me to the rural districts, to the one-horse farmer, a man who has 40 acres and a mule, and see if you find any opposition there to this appropriation. Not only that, but it is an encouragement to these farmers to improve their own crops. As to the quality of the seeds, I have no doubt but that if the free seeds are continued the seed men themselves will furnish better seed than they have been in the habit of doing.

Besides this, the little farmer in the rural district who receives from the Government a package of seeds feels that he has some interest in the Government and that the Government has some interest in him. If you take this from them, and the Post-Office Department, as it is threatening to do, curtails their little rural free delivery—cuts them off from that and refuses them the benefits of the second-class rates on papers that are issued in the interest of the farmer—then, indeed, may they feel that this Government has no interest in them. The Post-Office Department has lately refused this privilege to a paper published in Oklahoma in the interest of the farmer and which I hold in my hand. It is called "The Indiahoma Union Signal." Its motto is, "Unity of purpose, and that purpose to be education, industry, reason, justice, kindness, love, and universal happiness." Its subject-matter shows that it is trying to impress these eternal principles on the minds and hearts of its readers and to elevate and enlighten those who till the soil.

This is not the only publication of the kind which the Post-Office Department is trying in this way to suppress, but all over the South and West, where the farmers' unions are trying to build up their little publications, this same thing has occurred.

Mr. Chairman, when such papers as these are thus oppressed, when a paper of that character, literature of that kind, is thus discriminated against by the Post-Office Department, when it can not have the same facilities for circulation as the great metropolitan paper, then the people may well feel that they are not being treated right, but are being oppressed by the Government, which ought to be their protector. When a little $200,000 appropriation is being cut off because part of it goes to aid some poor farmers on the mountain side actually engaged in the cultivation of the soil, while millions are being spent for battle ships, these people feel that they are not being treated right by the Government.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he may have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURNETT. Take the extracts read by the chairman of the committee, and what are they from? They are from the city newspapers—papers whose columns are subsidized by the rich seedsmen. I would like to have some one show me such an extract from the country papers and the papers published in the rural districts that really express the sentiments of the people, because they know and they are in touch with these men who are working and earning their bread by the sweat of their brow. I have in my hand an extract from one of those papers published in my district, the Fort Payne Journal, which says that the Government, if it cuts off the little seed item, is proposing to treat the farmer unjustly in the interest of the great big appropriations for the Navy and other such extravagances. Gentlemen talk about its being paternalism, yet the same gentlemen will speak on this floor for hours asking for a more infamous and vicious paternalism to aid in building up some ship company that can not run with its own means. A few days ago we gave two millions and a half to aid the distressed people upon the Pacific coast. No man in this House supported that more cheerfully than I did, because it was an urgent demand of humanity; yet, when it comes down to the bare question of paternalism, I submit that that is much more paternalism than it is to aid the man in building up his little farm, knowing that the Government and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry are behind him and encouraging him in his efforts.

Mr. Chairman, I had rather take the statements of one country paper like the one referred to than every paid editorial the chairman of the committee has inserted in the RECORD. They know their people. They hear every heart throb and feel every pulse beat of their country neighbors. Many of the poor farmers of their counties pay the very subscription for their papers with the beans and tomatoes grown from the little package of Government seeds. Now, show me the editorials from the papers which reach the homes and the hearts of the poorer farmers denouncing this "graft," as you term it, and I will believe your witness. But so long as you flaunt in our faces the editorials of the large city dailies I shall dispute their right to speak for the bread makers of my country. I know how my people feel about this matter.

There is no greater pleasure that I enjoy in my official life than to meet these people and their families in their little homes in the valleys and upon the mountain tops, where the latchstring always hangs on the outside and the front door is always wide open, and share with them that hospitality which they are ever glad to dispense. It is these people, Mr. Chairman, to whom the nation goes whenever it is in peril. You will go to the kid-glove farmer perhaps when you want the high officers of your Army, but when you want to find the real fighting man, the private, the man behind the guns, the man on whom the nation may rely, you call for the man behind the plow. Gentlemen told about this being graft. This is a slander upon the Member of Congress who sends out the seed, and not only so, but the man who utters it slanders the good name of the farmers of our land. Stand up, you man who says this is graft, let your slander go into the records of this body, and then go home to meet the righteous condemnation of the men whom you have thus traduced. I challenge one of you to state in this presence that there is a single farmer in your district that can be bought with a package of garden seeds, or that there is a single Member of Congress who believes he can so buy them. But you tell us the seeds are no better than those sold by the regular seedsmen. I deny it. Doctor Galloway, the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, says it is not true.

In his hearing before the committee he said:

Mr. GALLOWAY. I can make a statement now. I do not see how anyone who took the ordinary precautions with the seed we send out could help from getting results. We send out seed that must necessarily be better than the ordinary seed that the seedsmen can secure.

Mr. SCOTT. Why?

Mr. GALLOWAY. For the reason that we buy our seed in this way: In the first place, a considerable portion of the seed is grown for us out of what we call our own stock. We know the full history of the stock. We get, for example, a pound of lettuce seed of a high quality, and it is true to name. Mr. SCOTT. Where is your seed grown?

Mr. GALLOWAY. The seed is grown all over the United States.

Mr. SCOTT. Do you make contracts in advance—that is, a year in advance?

Mr. GALLOWAY. We must do that. We are now making provision for the seed for next year. We have to do that in order to be perfectly safe; otherwise we could not secure the seed. We buy all the seed we can in the open market—that is, seed that is now available. We secure it now and have it delivered next August or September; but when it is delivered it must come up to these standards.

Mr. CANDLER. All of them are tested?

Mr. GALLOWAY. All of them are tested.

Mr. CANDLER. Every one when they come in?

Mr. GALLOWAY. When they come in.

Mr. FIELD. Doctor, the common impression is that dealers, such as Landreth and others, destroy all the old stock, so that each year they offer to the public fresh seed. Is that true?

Mr. GALLOWAY. That is one of the fairy stories that go out.

Mr. CANDLER. Landreth does claim he destroys all the seed left over.

Mr. GALLOWAY. I can not speak for any particular firm, but it is the general practice to blend seed. It is not only the general practice to blend seed, but there are all sorts of apparatus and devices that have for their object the rejuvenation of seed—that is, polishing devices that make the old seed look bright. There are certain devices that will rub the dust off. There are certain cases where, if they do not want seed to grow very well (where we get imported seed), they run them over hot plates to destroy some of the vitality. It is an object sometimes to have the seed, especially high-grade seed, low in vitality, the main object being to keep up the price.

Mr. FIELD. Are the seed that are not distributed one year by the Government used the next year for distribution?

Mr. GALLOWAY. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. How about that, Doctor? How is it about kiln-dried corn? You say in regard to other seed it does destroy vitality.

Mr. GALLOWAY. It is the pushing of the drying up beyond a certain point. If you dry out corn beyond a certain moisture—beyond a certain percentage—you will destroy the vitality; but if you take out some of the excessive moisture you really improve the corn. It will germinate quicker.

Mr. CANDLER. You said, a few minutes ago, that the seed left over, if there was any left over, were not sent out the following year.

Mr. GALLOWAY. There has never been any such miraculous happening as any seed being left over.

Mr. CANDLER. Then there is nothing sent out but fresh seed, and those have been thoroughly tested and found to be true to their type?

Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes; and good in vitality.

Mr. CANDLER. So that they ought to be the very best seed that are sent out.

Mr. GALLOWAY. Under the old practices, before the Department got its own seed, it was the custom to run in poor seed. We could not avoid it. For instance, we made a contract with one man to furnish the seed and do all the work connected with the package, and we specified in the contract that he should furnish certain varieties. When he got along in the busy season, such as it is now—putting up three or four hundred thousand packages a day—he would come in with the statement: "We can't furnish the red Valentine bean. We haven't been able to secure it anywhere. Would not some other variety do just as well?" He would say, "I can't get anything but this other variety," and we would have to take it or let the bean drop out.

Mr. CANDLER. What course do you pursue in order to prevent that?

Mr. GALLOWAY. By taking things forehanded we can make provision all along the line. We have right now enough seed for next year's distribution.

Mr. CANDLER. When the seed come in and you test them and find they do not come up to the standard and are not true to type, what course do you pursue in reference to those seed?

Mr. GALLOWAY. The man who agreed to furnish that seed must take them away. That is, we test in part on the sample and then we test when they come in.

Mr. CANDLER. You do not use them at all?

Mr. GALLOWAY. No.

Doctor Galloway is a man of such high integrity that no one would have the temerity to question his statement, and by reason of his intelligence and experience his statements are worthy of absolute credence. He is a disinterested witness, looking alone to the discharge of his duty and the good of the farmer. It would lighten his labors, and at the same time not reduce his salary, to rid him of the seed distribution. This being true, I would take his statement rather than that of a hundred seedsmen. Besides, from the reports that I have myself had from the farmers of my district, I know that what he says is true. I remember one particular instance where a Populist friend of mine told me his experience with some seed which I sent him. It was Rev. Mr. Blair, of near Center, Ala. He told me that when he got the seed he said to his wife that he guessed these were some old Democratic seed that BURNETT had sent him, and were no good, but that he would give them a trial anyhow.

So he planted them right by the side of a lot of bought seed, and bestowed the same care on both, and when the drought struck them he said the bought seed withered and died, but his BURNETT seed went right on growing and bearing beautifully.

A friend of mine on Sand Mountain told me last year that he made about 400 pounds of seed cotton of the finest staple from the package of seed I sent him.

I might add many other letters and statements of the same kind had I time. But, Mr. Chairman, my time is out, and if you will indulge me a few minutes longer I will say a word or two in a general way about this agricultural bill.

It only carries about seven and a half millions of dollars for all the purposes of the Agricultural Department, and yet a bill has just been reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs which proposes to spend $10,000,000 on one battle ship and $90,000,000 for other matters connected with the Navy.

Think of it, gentlemen! More money spent on one battle ship than is spent in looking after the agricultural interests of the entire Government. What are we coming to? A government which grudges to the man who feeds the nation a measly pittance for improved seed, and yet will spend one hundred millions wrung from the toiling masses simply to make the world afraid of us. Gentlemen, such things can not last. Already you hear the mutterings of discontent throughout the land, and unless present methods are changed these mutterings will culminate in the thunders of revolution.

Mr. Chairman, I am not radical in my views. I am not one of those who rejoice in the charge of being "agin the Government." There is no element of the socialist in my makeup. And yet when the disposition which has cropped out in the consideration of this bill, and which is apparent from the action of the Post-Office Department in its effort to cut off rural free delivery from the farmers of the country, to keep his literature out of the mails, and many other such covert attacks upon him, become so apparent, it is time for every man in public life to rise up in their defense.

But you say the farmers are prospering as never before. In the South this is true. But, Mr. Chairman, it is because they have asserted themselves, and in their cotton association and their unions have banded together in a financial policy that is bringing prosperity. I might elaborate on this phase of the question to great length, but must desist with the exclamation, Shame on the men who have here attempted, not corruptly, I think, but who nevertheless have attempted to strike at the poorer classes of the farmers in the interest of millionaire seedsmen! [Great applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 18709. An act making additional appropriations for the public service on account of earthquake and attending conflagration on the Pacific coast; and

H. R. 15331. An act making appropriation for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5796. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River and to establish it as a post-road;

S. 5773. An act to provide a site and buildings for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor; and

S. 5530. An act authorizing the procuring of additional land for the enlargement of the site for the public building at Kalamazoo, Mich.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the following bill; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 395. An act concerning foreign-built dredges.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Weather Bureau: Professors of meteorology, inspectors, district forecasters, local forecasters, section directors, research observers, observers, assistant observers, operators, repair men, station agents, messengers, messenger boys, laborers, and other necessary employees, for duty in the United States, in the West Indies or on adjacent coasts, in the Hawaiian Islands, and in Bermuda, who, without additional expense to the Government, may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leave of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year, which leave may, in exceptional and meritorious cases where such an employee is ill, be extended in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture not to exceed fifteen days additional in any one year, $541,550.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to correct a typographical error in lines 11 and 12, on page 7. There is a repetition in those lines of the words already appearing in lines 9 and 10, "without additional expense to the Government," and I move to strike out those words in lines 11 and 12.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the correction.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buildings, Weather Bureau: For the purchase of sites and the erection of not more than five buildings for use as Weather Bureau observatories, and for all necessary labor, materials, and expenses, plans and specifications to be prepared and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, and work done under the supervision of the Chief of the Weather Bureau, including the purchase of instruments, furniture, supplies, flagstaffs, and storm-warning towers to properly equip these stations: Provided, That if any of the money for these several buildings remains unexpended for the special purposes for which it is appropriated, so much of it as is necessary may be expended for the repair, improvement, and equipment of any other buildings or grounds owned by the Government and occupied by the Weather Bureau outside of the District of Columbia, $53,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is it the intention to have these Weather Bureau buildings at all of the 200 stations in the United States evenually?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I can not say as to that. The intention is to gradually improve and better what you might call the "plant." Where we are paying high rent and there is an opportunity to acquire a piece of ground at a fair price, or if there is some Government land available, the policy will be to erect thereon a building and save rent.

Mr. MURDOCK. What is the average cost of one of these buildings?

Mr. WADSWORTH. About $12,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. And who determines where these buildings shall go?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Secretary of Agriculture, I suppose, with the advice of the Chief of the Weather Bureau.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to ask one other question on this paragraph. Professor Moore makes a remarkable statement in the hearings, to wit, that employment in the Weather Bureau superinduces insanity. Did the committee take that seriously?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am frank to say that I do not recall that remark. If he did make such a statement, I do not remember it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the chairman of the committee if that is not necessary as a preliminary in many cases? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the chairman will permit, I would like to reply in addition to what he has already said to my colleague as to the intention of the Bureau in the matter of building additional Weather Bureau buildings. The reply is this: That in the large cities it is impracticable for the Government to erect a building because it can not secure sufficient free space about it. In a great many of the cities the Government, of course, has buildings already, and wherever possible the Weather Bureau station is in connection with those buildings. In other cities it is located on other high buildings where the surroundings are favorable for taking the observations, but as a general proposition it is true that it is the policy of the Bureau to build and own its own stations wherever that is practical.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, just one more question. Has the committee any information as to where these five additional stations are to go this year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. These are not five additional stations; these are five new buildings. In the previous paragraph we provide for four new stations. These are five new buildings at established stations.

Mr. MURDOCK. The committee has no such information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; we allow the Chief of the Bureau to decide that from a scientific view, where needed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

PENALTY FOR COUNTERFEITING FORECASTS.

Any person who shall knowingly issue or publish any counterfeit weather forecasts or warnings of weather conditions, falsely representing such forecasts or warnings to have been issued by the Weather Bureau or other branch of the Government service, or shall molest or interfere with any weather or storm flag or weather map or bulletin displayed or issued by the United States Weather Bureau, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof, for each offense, be fined in a sum not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not to exceed ninety days, or be both fined and imprisoned, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I see no objection to the paragraph except that it is already permanent law. It was enacted into law, I think, on an agricultural appropriation bill several years ago, and it has been continued and carried in the annual appropriation bill from time to time, and it does not add anything to the force or the efficiency of the penal provision to keep repeating it in every agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. Is this provision carried in any statute outside of an appropriation bill?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It was not made by any statute outside of an appropriation bill, but the rule is that appropriation bills may contain permanent laws, continuing laws, the same as any other bills or acts. They may be subject to a point of order when first proposed, but now if a point of order were made against this paragraph it would be overruled doubtless by the Chair because it is already legislation, notwithstanding it may have been originally enacted in a general appropriation bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Would it be legislation next year if it was omitted from the appropriation bill this year?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, most certainly, because it is general in its character. There is nothing better settled under the rules of the House and the decisions of the Chair than that a provision in a general appropriation bill that is general in its character and continuing or permanent in its nature is as much law and as much permanent law as if enacted independently. I made the motion not that I am especially interested in the matter, but to call the attention of the gentlemen who are on this important committee to the fact that it does not add anything to the law and requires the Government to pay a few dollars every year for the printing of this unnecessary and superfluous paragraph. We had about as well include all the penal statutes in a general appropriation bill, so as to remind Congress and the country once a year at least that there are penalties for violating the law. That is the only good I can see it can possibly serve.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is identically the same language?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Identically the same. I have before me the agricultural appropriation bill of last year, and it has been carried in this identical language in the appropriation bill for five or six years.

Mr. MANN. And it ought to be stricken out?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It ought to be stricken out of this bill, because it is already the law.

Mr. MANN. It is the law?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman from Indiana, suppose you apply that rule to page 6, for instance, fuel, lights, and repairs, Weather Bureau——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would not, because——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then all you would have to say would be, fuel, lights, and repairs, Weather Bureau, $6,000, without going into details?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is an appropriation for the next fiscal year, and in its very nature it is temporary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The items have been named in past years.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is all true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why repeat them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. They are provisions for a year at a time, but in relation to this provision there is nothing in its nature or in its terms to show that it is to be simply for the fiscal year. It is permanent in its character. If the gentleman insists that it be in and will subserve any useful purpose, I have no objection, but I regard it as superfluous.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not see any harm it can do.

Mr. MANN. There is harm; decided harm.

Mr. WADSWORTH. What is it?

Mr. MANN. If you attempt to prosecute under this act and it should be in fact only a year, the law will expire before the prosecution could be had, and you would be without any law, and when you put it in year after year it is an assumption on your part that it is only good for one year. You can not effect and carry through a prosecution under this provision within a year, if the defendant has a good attorney, for before you get him convicted the law would expire, if your contention is correct. If our contention is correct, it is a general statute; it is part of the permanent law of the land, and there is no sense in repeating the permanent law every year in an appropriation bill. Your putting it in only gives the construction to it on our part that it is not the permanent law. I dare say you could not effect a prosecution and obtain a conviction unless the court should decide it is the permanent law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can only say in answer to the gentleman that a great deal of this bill could go out under that theory.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the committee does not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I grant to the gentleman the bill might in many respects be well considered and perfected in that regard, but this is the more glaring provision of the bill, because there is not one cent of appropriation in connection with it. Now, in most cases you carry an appropriation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. There are a good many provisions in this bill that might well be put in permanent statute and left out of the bill, but usually they are carried with an appropriation; but I think the gentleman ought to consider the fact that keeping this in the bill only weakens the law and does not strengthen it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee is not strenuous on the point whether it remains or not.

Mr. BOWIE. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question, Mr. Chairman. I want to ask him now, if this is a permanent law, and would be the law if it were stricken out, how it could possibly be weakened? How could you weaken a law?

Mr. MANN. By putting it in we give the construction to it that it is not a permanent law.

Mr. BOWIE. I understand. You can not construe it. It must be construed by the court. If we assume that the courts will construe that it is a permanent law, how can it be weakened by being repeated?

Mr. MANN. If the courts shall construe it to be a permanent law, then it can not be weakened by being continued.

Mr. BOWIE. That is my point.

Mr. MANN. That is true. What is the object of our making a construction of the law which does weaken it? That is my point. It amounts to nothing unless it is a permanent law, and there is no way to obtain a conviction under it unless it is a permanent law. There is no such thing as a temporary law of this kind.

Mr. BOWIE. The gentleman will recognize this proposition, that Congress can not construe its own law; it must be construed by the court, and that is a judicial point.

Mr. MANN. While that construction is not binding upon the court, the immediate construction of a law often does guide the court in its construction.

Mr. BOWIE. It has been in this bill several times. According to the gentleman's contention, it has been in here five or six times, and, if there is any danger about it, the harm has already been done.

Mr. MANN. I called the attention of the committee to this subject before, with the understanding that the provision would be left out of future bills.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the gentleman understand that this is permanent law?

Mr. BOWIE. I am inclined to think that that is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. That it is a permanent law?

Mr. BOWIE. But I can not see that you could better the thing by omitting it. We have already printed it.

Mr. NORRIS. I will admit that, for argument's sake; but if you concede it is a permanent law, which I think you must, then what is the use of reenacting it in an appropriation bill? What good does it do?

Mr. BOWIE. None whatever, unless upon this theory: If I am mistaken and you are mistaken, and if it is not permanent law, then you save it by reenacting it. On the other hand, if you and I are correct, and it is a permanent law, we do not do any harm by leaving it in.

Mr. NORRIS. As it stands there it would be a permanent law. It shows on its face to be one. There does not seem to be any more reason for reenacting this criminal statute here every year than there would be any other criminal statute.

Mr. BOWIE. I can not see any possible good in striking it out, and it would be a proper thing to have it in in the event we are mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. I would strike it out on the theory that all other criminal statutes ought to be left out where they are already law. It does not help them any to reenact the entire criminal——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. The committee is not particular as to whether this goes out or not.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Bureau of Animal Industry: One Chief of Bureau, $4,500; one chief clerk, $2,000; two clerks of class 4, $3,600; one editor, $2,000; five clerks of class 3, $8,000; thirteen clerks of class 2, $18,200; thirteen clerks of class 1, $15,600; eight clerks, at $1,000 each, $8,000; two clerks, at $900 each, $1,800; two clerks, at $840 each, $1,680; three clerks, at $720 each, $2,160; two clerks, at $600 each, $1,200; one mechanic, $1,200; one messenger and custodian, $1,000; one carpenter, $1,100; one messenger, $840; four messengers, at $720 each, $2,880; one skilled laborer, $840; two skilled laborers, at $720 each, $1,440; two skilled laborers, at $600 each, $1,200; one skilled laborer, $660; two skilled laborers, at $480 each, $960; one fireman, $720; one illustrator, $1,400; in all, $82,980.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I desire to ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes. It may not take me over seven or eight.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks that he may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks at this particular point, although, as a matter of fact, what I shall have to say refers somewhat to an appropriation which we will reach later in the bill. But as they refer also to the question of animal industry, I desire to present them at this point.

The question is, Shall we continue to endear ourselves to the hearts of our constituents by distributing among them a few thousand packages annually of seeds of unknown vintage and uncertain heredity, of the fragrant onion, the luscious rutabaga, and the humble but glorious "the kind that mother used to make" pie-promoting pumpkin; or shall we, with Spartan self-denial, forego this ancient and potent promoter of our claims to statesmanship?

For me, I confess to conflicting emotions in this matter, although, as the Representative of a pastoral and agricultural people, I suffer none of the qualms of conscience relative to the cost of this garden-seed statesmanship that seems to have touched the tender consciences of gentlemen from the city districts whose constituents do not hanker for garden seeds.

No; I am not troubled in the matter on the ground of economy. I would rather prefer to save a few dollars to the National Treasury, if need be, by reducing by a pound or two the proposed tonnage of that $10,000,000 battle ship that the Committee on Naval Affairs would have us build. It is, at any rate, altogether too big a boat to float in any creek up our way.

No, Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of economizing in the few crumbs of recognition accorded to the real bone and sinew of the country, the farmer and the ranchman; but having been rudely jarred in my complacency over my flower-seed distribution by having had a lady constituent of mine, to whom I had sent several packages of seed bearing their botanical names, which were Greek to me, and labeled "rare and valuable" by the Agricultural Department, point out to me a glorious and vigorous array of seven kinds of sunflowers as the result of my seed distribution, and having had some little difficulty in selecting a proper location in the bracing and glorious but by no means tropical climate of my State for the date palm and cotton seed which are furnished for distribution by a munificent Government, it has occurred to me that possibly the present expenditure for the seed of assorted "garden sass" might be more advantageously utilized if used for the purchase and dissemination of things that the enterprising agriculturist really desired, and which would diversify and improve his products, rather than for the tame and altogether commonplace assortment of squash, turnips, and mignonette with which we have been regaling them out of this appropriation.

My views in this matter have been much strengthened in the past few days by the receipt of a unique and altogether meritorious request from one of my constituents for a contribution from the Agricultural Department, which it would afford me great pleasure to furnish could I do so, and the distribution of which I feel confident would contribute even more to the present nation-wide popularity of the Agricultural Department than did the introduction of the "critter" that stores nitrogen in the roots of alfalfa, or the "varmint" that is said to play Jack the Giant Killer to the cotton boll weevil.

This request, which I have the honor to present to the House in the hope that its presentation may lead to the widening of the scope of this appropriation, so that such meritorious requests may hereafter be granted, possesses the added virtue of being couched in verse. It is sent to me by one Joe Magill, poet lariat of the far-famed hot springs town of Thermopolis in my State, who, with the modesty characteristic of genius, subscribes himself "A reformed Irish-American cow puncher and a mighty poor poet."

I present this petition with some reluctance to the House by reason of the fact that it contains a somewhat flattering allusion to myself, but far be it from me to deny my people the sacred constitutional right of petition, even though my humble self be involved therein.

The petition is as follows:

A POETIC PETITION FOR TWO GOATS.

Frank W., my boy, you're our pride and our joy;
May they send you to Congress again.
If you'll do me a favor, by my soul I'll endeavor
To aid you with voice and with pen.

I haven't a cow and I'm sure you'll allow
That coffee's poor stuff without cream;
But what can you do when you haven't a sou
And riches are merely a dream?

The goat, 'spite its capers, I learn from the papers,
Of milk is an elegant source;
The fluid is good, 'tis drink, aye, and food,
And more healthful than Grape Nuts or Force.

The Billy's a butter, but the Nanny gives butter
That will make the bacteria sick;
Micrococci, bacilli, are knocked dead or silly
As if hit with an ax or a stick.

There are two breeds, I hear, faith I hope they're not dear,
The Department of Ag. has imported.
I like the Swiss goat, but just think of a coat
From the wool of the Persian assorted.

But Persian or Swiss—sure none comes amiss
When the dairy's as dry as a crater.
As the old Latins say, so in this case I may,
"Discrimine nullo agetur." [a]

Now, please get me two; a Nanny will do
To give milk for a short season only;
As a milker she's fine, but I fear she'd decline
To carry on business when lonely.

Just further my plan, and I know, Frank, you can;
So get me a Billy and Nanny,
And I'll chant forth your praise to the end of my days
From Thermopolis clear up to Frannie.

If you'll aid this my scheme—and I know 'tis no dream—
You can make it a brilliant success.
I swear, if you do, I'll pray daily that you
May be President, devil a less.

POSTSCRIPT.

Should you fear for a slip, or red tape need to rip—
For red tape, sad to say's not a myth—
I'll name an old friend who his aid sure will lend:
The Honorable WALTER I. SMITH.

JOE MAGILL, Thermopolis, Wyo.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, that this is the first petition from the real people, the agriculturists, so far received, and I hope that we may be able to so widen the scope of this appropriation some time in the future that such reasonable requests may be granted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the formal amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry: For carrying out the provisions of the act approved May 29, 1884, establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, and the act approved August 30, 1890, providing for an inspection of meats and animals, and the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1891, providing for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof which are the subjects of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, and to prescribe rules and regulations for the safe transport and humane treatment of export cattle from the United States to foreign countries, and the amendatory act approved March 2, 1895, providing for the inspection of live cattle, hogs, and the carcasses and products thereof which are the subjects of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, and also the provisions of the act approved February 2, 1903, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more effectually suppress and prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes; and also the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1905, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain quarantine districts, to permit and regulate the movement of cattle and other live stock therefrom, and for other purposes: Provided, That live horses be entitled to the same inspection as other animals herein named: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, waive the requirement of a certificate with beef and other products which are exported to countries that do not require such inspection, $1,575,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary or expedient, in such manner as he may think best, in the collection of information and dissemination of knowledge concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products, and to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, blackleg, tuberculosis, sheep scab, glanders or farcy, hog cholera, and other diseases of animals, and for this purpose to employ as many persons in the city of Washington or elsewhere as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals and the quarantine of the same whenever in his judgment it is essential to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia, tuberculosis, or other diseases of animals from one State to another; for improving and maintaining the Bureau Experiment Station, at Bethesda, Md.; to establish, improve, and maintain quarantine stations, and to provide proper shelter and equipment for the care of neat cattle, domestic and other animals imported at such ports as may be deemed necessary; for printing and publishing such reports relating to animal industry as he may direct; and the Secretary of Agriculture may use so much of this sum as he deems necessary for promoting the extension and development of foreign markets for dairy and other farm products of the United States, and for suitable transportation of the same; and such products may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to apply the moneys received from the sales of such products toward the continuation and repetition of such experimental exports; and the Secretary is hereby authorized to rent suitable buildings in the District of Columbia, at an annual rental of not exceeding $2,500, to be used for office, laboratory, and storage purposes for said Bureau of Animal Industry; and the employees of the Bureau of Animal Industry outside of the city of Washington may hereafter, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leaves of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year, which leave may, in exceptional and meritorious cases where such an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed fifteen days additional in any one year: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may construe the provisions of the act of March 3, 1891, as amended March 2, 1895, for the inspection of live cattle and products thereof, to include dairy products intended for exportation to any foreign country, and may apply, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, the provisions of said act for inspection and certification appropriate for ascertaining the purity and quality of such products, and may cause the same to be so marked, stamped, or labeled as to secure their identity and make known in the markets of foreign countries to which they may be sent from the United States their purity, quality, and grade; and all the provisions of said act relating to live cattle and products thereof for export shall apply to dairy products so inspected and certified: Provided, That not more than $100,000 of the sum herein appropriated shall be used for the microscopic inspection and certification of pork for export: Provided further, That the Secretary of Agriculture be authorized to expend of the amount hereby appropriated, through the dairy division of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, a sum not to exceed $20,000 in further developing the dairy industry of the Southern States by conducting experiments, holding institutes, and giving object lessons in cooperation with individual dairymen and State experiment stations: Provided, also, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to expend $5,000 of the amount hereby appropriated, to especially investigate hemorrhagic septicemia, infectious cerebro-spinal meningitis, and malignant catarrh, prevalent in the State of Minnesota and adjoining States, to work out, if possible, in cooperation with the Minnesota Experiment Station, the problem of prevention by developing antitoxin or preventive vaccines and to secure and diffuse information along these lines.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the part of the paragraph beginning with and including the word "and," in line 7, page 13, and down to and including the word "exports," in line 16, page 13.

The point of order is based upon the idea that the provision changes existing law. This paragraph has been carried in a number of agricultural appropriation bills, but from its nature it is temporary—not permanent, not continuing. It applies to the immediate appropriation. The paragraph appropriates upward of a million and a half dollars to be used during the next fiscal year for the purposes enumerated, so that it is necessarily and essentially a provision limiting and confining the appropriation, or authorizing the appropriation for this specific purpose. It applies of necessity to the appropriation contained in the paragraph.

Now, I concede that where there is legislation of a permanent and continuing character contained in an appropriation bill it is just as much law, when enacted and approved, as if it were contained in an independent bill, and subsequently it may become the basis for appropriations in general appropriation bills under the rules of the House. On the other hand, it is settled by a large number of precedents in this House that a provision of this kind, carried from year to year in an appropriation bill, is only for the fiscal year. It only makes law for that one year, and does not furnish the basis, under the rules of the House, to authorize an appropriation on the same subject for the next year.

Now, this provision does not relate to agriculture within the sense of the law. There is no statute anywhere authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to take the public funds and go into the open market and buy farm products, dairy products, and fruit products to ship abroad, and to use the receipts of those sales abroad to repeat the purchase. This paragraph carries about $1,500,000, and an absolute discretion is vested in the Secretary of Agriculture to use this entire sum if he sees fit, to go into the markets and buy oats, wheat, corn, hay, butter, cheese, or anything of that kind that he sees fit to buy, for the purpose of export and sale in foreign markets, and it authorizes him to repeat that operation without limit. I repeat that there is no legislation authorizing any such power. I have before me the original statute creating——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] whether he knows of any law aside from that contained in previous appropriation bills authorizing this expenditure?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I do not. I am inclined to think the provision is subject to a point of order. It has been carried in the bill one or two years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am inclined to think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. MANN. This is a matter of considerable importance, and it does not seem to me that the point of order is well taken, although the gentleman from Indiana has invoked it and the Chair seems ready to rule. The provision of law itself in the appropriation bill, so far as the object is concerned, does not relate simply to the current appropriation. The Secretary of Agriculture may use so much of this sum—that is, the current appropriation—as he deems necessary, "and such products may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to apply the moneys received from the sales of such products toward the continuation and repetition of such experimental reports." That is not something confined to the appropriation act. That is general legislation, giving to the Secretary of Agriculture authority to buy in the open market this class of products and sell them and to reimburse him out of the proceeds of the sale. Now, if that be the policy of the Government, as defined in this law and in permanent form, then it is perfectly proper to make appropriation for it. It is not limited.

Here is a permanent policy provided in this act authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase in the open market and to sell. Now, to say that only applies for the year would prevent him from carrying out a transaction expressly authorized by the statute as a matter of permanent policy. As to whether he is able to do this without the appropriation of money is another question. The appropriation is confined to the current year. The appropriation of a part of this sum is confined to the current year, and it authorizes the purchase in the open market, but to make the sale it is not confined to the current year. It is a part of the law and need not be repeated in this appropriation act and properly ought not to be repeated in it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman is correct, if this paragraph goes out on a point of order the Secretary would have the power to use the money for the purpose specified.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly he would not. Giving the Secretary of Agriculture authority to do a certain thing and providing the sum of money with which he may do it are two essentially different propositions. The Secretary of Agriculture can only expend money in accordance with the appropriation made, and when we make an appropriation and define the purpose for which the appropriation is made the Secretary can not expend the money for something else, although the law authorizes him to do something else.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman will permit me, these provisions are only permissive; but that does not preclude the expenditure of this money for any other legal purpose.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. We may authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to do something to-day, and, if we make the appropriation, give him the authority to do something else to-morrow. He can not divert the fund for which we make the appropriation and spend it for something else that he may be authorized to do.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. I understand the gentleman's argument to be that assuming this same provision to be in the appropriation bill passed for the previous year, it authorizes this appropriation. Am I correct?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman reaches that conclusion; I reached that conclusion.

Mr. OLMSTED. The difficulty with me is that this act says that the Secretary may use so much of this money as he deems necessary. If that was the provision in the former bill, was not the operation of the former bill limited to the expenditure of the sum provided in that bill and would that serve as a basis of authority for further appropriations for the same purpose?

Mr. MANN. It clearly would not. There is no possible question about that. So far as the appropriation was concerned, it would not be an object in process, but entirely separate from the appropriation. This current law authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to do certain things. That is not limiting the appropriation at all; that is the current law.

Mr. OLMSTED. It seems to me that that is to be construed in connection with the preceding clause. He may use so much of this sum as he deems necessary for promoting the development of foreign markets, and in so developing them he may purchase products out of this sum.

Mr. MANN. That is the question involved, it seems to me. I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I appreciate the point, but it seems to me that this is authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to buy in the market and sell if he chooses to. If we make no appropriation for it, then he can not expend any more money than he receives from the sale, but the authority is given there, as I take it, by the law to do that. The question of making the appropriation is another proposition entirely.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the Chair's attention to section 526 of the act where the Agricultural Department was created. It is section 526 of the Revised Statutes, and reads as follows:

SEC. 526. The Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics and by any other appropriate means within his power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the last clause I read covers the point at issue. As I understand this clause in the bill it authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture, for instance, in the line of our corn exports to go into the market and purchase corn, if he so desires, or oats or fruit or any other product of the farm and export that and take the revenues derived therefrom and keep repeating that experiment. It is for the purpose of gathering information relating to the Agricultural Department and the agriculture in this country, and it seems to me that this clause of the statute covers that ground and gives him the warrant of law for making this experiment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, referring to the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] it seems to me the portion of the statute which he read does not show the law which applies to the language in question, as I understand it. This is for the purpose, the promotion, extension, and development of foreign markets for dairy and farm products. It is not for the purpose of developing the farm, not for the purpose of taking care of our own farming institutions, but for the purpose of developing foreign markets for the products of farms.

The CHAIRMAN. In the judgment of the Chair the proposition contained in this paragraph is not a continuation of a public work within the language and intent of the rule of the House, and there being no law authorizing the provision, that contained in previous annual appropriation bills being merely temporary, the Chair holds that this paragraph does involve a change in existing law, and is therefore subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve the point of order to the provision on pages 14 and 15, beginning with line 22 on page 14 and ending with line 13 on page 15, and pending the consideration of that point of order, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment which I think will remedy the whole matter, and then I shall not insist on the point of order if the amendment be agreed to. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa presents an amendment and asks unanimous consent that it may be considered before he raises his point of order. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the amendment is before we give consent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, let us have the amendment read.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have the point of order stated.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I will state that the provision just referred to is new legislation, and is clearly subject to a point of order, and in this appropriation for meat inspection two items—one $20,000 and one $5,000—have been deducted from the amount appropriated for the inspection of meat. The amount is already cut down $104,000. I can not believe that it was intended that the $25,000 should be also included, reducing the amount $129,000. I am now offering an amendment to increase the amount $129,000, which will give the amount estimated for and asked by the Secretary of Agriculture. All the interest I have in the matter is that I think we should have adequate funds to provide for this inspection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it seems impossible for me to ascertain what the point of order covers.

Mr. HAUGEN. The proviso on pages 14 and 15 is new legislation, and clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 11 and 12, on page 12, strike out the words "one million five hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one million seven hundred and four thousand dollars."

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, it does not seem necessary to discuss this amendment at any length.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that this amendment is pending? I think if the gentleman wishes to make a point of order he should make it and we should dispose of that now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that this amendment may be considered as pending before he raises his point of order. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am not willing to reverse the rules of the House in that respect, and I object.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing that this appropriation should be made for this experiment, but I am not willing that it should be taken out of the money intended for the inspection of meat.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I may be perfectly willing to agree with him, but I am not willing to have the committee put in the position where it is being held up on the threat of a point of order in reference to an amendment. Let us consider it on its merits.

Mr. HAUGEN. Does the gentleman wish me to speak to the amendment?

Mr. MANN. Yes; but in doing so the gentleman will waive his point of order. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to shove the gentleman off entirely.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not wish to take advantage of these gentlemen who are interested in this amendment, but I object to its being taken from the amount appropriated for the inspection of meat. All I ask is that the House consider this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will have to insist upon it.

Mr. MANN. What became of the item, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made——

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the point of order and offer the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe it is necessary to discuss the amendment at length. I believe that every Member of this House appreciates the importance of the amendment. If we fail to appropriate this money, we will deprive the cattle growers of our country of their market, as they will be unable to dispose of their stock.

It not only concerns the cattle growers of this country, but every packing industry of this country as well; and if you fail to appropriate the amount you discriminate in favor of the large packing concerns against the smaller. It concerns the good health of every meat consumer in the United States and subserves the health of every American citizen. The amount asked for is $1,679,000; the amount appropriated is $1,575,000, or a difference of $104,000, but to this amount $20,000 for the extension of the dairy interests and $5,000 for some experiments in connection with the experimental station of Minnesota should be added, making a total of $129,000. I will now ask that the Clerk read a communication from Doctor Salmon, which explains the situation.

The Clerk read as follows:

APRIL 24, 1905.

The SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

SIR: Referring to H. R. 18536, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, the total appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry, as it appears in the bill, is $1,682,980. The total amount requested in the estimates, including statutory salaries, general expenses, tick eradication, and animal feeding and breeding, amounted to $1,811,980, subdivided as follows:

Meat inspection	$840,000
Microscopic pork inspection	100,000
Export cattle and vessel inspection	60,000
Southern cattle quarantine inspection	54,000
Sheep and cattle scab eradication	398,000
Maladie du coit eradication	4,000
Inspection and quarantine of imported animals	32,000
Hog-cholera experiments	6,000
Laboratories and experiment station and scientific investigations	75,000
Animal husbandry	10,000
Dairying	70,000
Administrative and miscellaneous expenditures	30,000
Tick eradication	25,000
Animal feeding and breeding	25,000
Statutory salaries	82,980
Total	1,811,980

The amount requested for tick eradication has been provided for in another section of the bill and increased to $65,000. The difference, therefore, between the amount requested and the amount recommended by the bill is in the amount for general expenses. This amount, as requested, is $1,679,000, and the amount recommended is $1,575,000, or a difference of $104,000. The estimates were very conservative, and the increases were based upon the numerous urgent requests for meat inspection at establishments that are engaged in the shipment of interstate and export meat products, which products should be inspected, as indicated by the acts of 1891 and 1895. From time to time the necessity of increasing the efficiency of the meat-inspection service has become apparent, and, so far as possible, this has been done. It is still necessary to exercise greater supervision over the inspection of animals at the time of slaughter, and it is also necessary to extend this supervision to all meat products until they leave the abattoir where prepared. This additional supervision will require additional assistants, and I consider it very necessary that this precaution be taken.

Several slaughtering establishments engaged quite extensively in interstate trade are without inspection and have not requested that the Department inaugurate inspection at their plants. The failure on the part of some of these establishments to ask for inspection is evidently due to their ability, under present conditions, to slaughter and ship diseased animals which should be condemned and destroyed. These establishments should all be compelled to have inspection or be prevented from entering into interstate traffic.

For several years the Department has been endeavoring through quarantine measures to prevent the spread of scabies among cattle and sheep in certain Western States. As all of the sheep and cattle in these States are not affected with the disease, it is necessary that inspectors be provided in order that healthy animals may be shipped out of the States to markets. On account of the limited appropriation it has not been possible to provide a sufficient number of inspectors for the inspection of cattle, and it has been necessary to permit the shipment of apparently healthy animals to market centers without inspection, the cars containing them being placarded "Uninspected cattle." This measure has not brought the relief that was anticipated, as shippers desire to know before shipment whether their animals, after being inspected at destination, will be permitted further shipment in case it is necessary, or whether they will be quarantined. Frequently animals have been shipped under this provision which were diseased, not only causing great losses to the shippers, but making it necessary for the railroad companies to disinfect their cars, as well as the chutes and stock yards at the shipping point, and the stock-yard companies to disinfect the pens at destination. This has caused these concerns much additional expense and has had the effect of removing from use for a time quite a large number of cars which were badly needed during the busy shipping season. It is of the utmost importance that sufficient inspectors be provided to facilitate these shipments.

It has also been necessary to curtail very greatly the field inspection force that has been engaged, in cooperation with State officials, in the eradication of scab among sheep and cattle. It is most important that this work be continued in order that the States affected can be released from quarantine and the inspectors stationed there removed to other sections where their services are needed in similar work. Unless a sufficient force is provided so that the work of eradication can be completely performed, it is obvious that the disease will continue for many years. This cooperation has been commenced at the urgent request of the officials of the States and is in exact harmony with the law of 1884 establishing the Bureau.

I would respectfully suggest that Congress be again requested to provide the amount originally recommended.

Very respectfully,

A. D. MELVIN,
Chief of Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from New York rises to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Iowa he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HEPBURN. I rose for the purpose of making a request.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All right.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make that motion simply for the purpose of making a request. I made some observations the other day before the committee, and I now ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the committee has allowed an increase to the Bureau of Animal Industry over the appropriation of 1905–6 of $142,980. In the opinion of the committee, with one exception, that was an ample increase to meet all needs.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question on that point?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee will remember when we had the emergency deficiency bill under consideration this question of additional aid to the Bureau of Animal Industry came up, and the Secretary then asked for $130,000 or $134,000 additional money to carry on the work of eradicating scab in cattle and sheep. After investigation the committee finally, with the concurrence of the Senate, allowed him $65,000. Now we have increased the appropriation over last year $142,000, which is, in round numbers, $12,000 more than he asked in his deficiency bill. There is no doubt, in my opinion, if I may continue, and then I will answer any questions——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman state what the increase is? Is the increase you speak of over the agricultural bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; over the annual appropriation for the Bureau of Animal Industry for 1905–6, and the increase is $142,980.

Mr. MANN. You include the amount in the deficiency bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; we arrived at that increase somewhat by judging how much deficiency there was in 1905–6, and we gave what he claimed the deficiency was. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word on this question. I think the Department of Agriculture—and I have some personal knowledge—is unduly alarmed over scabies in cattle, and I see by the allotment of money they have allowed $398,000 for scabies in cattle and scab in sheep. Now, I know something about the cattle business. I have large interests in Texas and small interests in Colorado. I have handled cattle for forty years. I have bought them in every State almost where cattle are raised, including Canada. I have bought them in Buffalo, Chicago, St. Louis, Kansas City, and I have never seen a case of scabies.

Now, that statement may seem extraordinary, but it is absolutely true. I have never seen a case of it. I think the Department has listened to employees out there who have been panic-stricken and exaggerate the danger. That is the information I get from the cattlemen of the West.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman's opinion formed from the fact that he never happened to see a case of scabies?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Somewhat, and from men interested in Texas and Colorado, where I am part owner of lands and cattle. I have never seen a case of it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman had been around stock yards, he could have seen thousands of cases.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No man living has ever seen thousands of cases around stock yards; neither the gentleman from Illinois nor anybody else has seen them. It does not exist, and Doctor Melvin himself, in the hearings before the committee, as you will see, admitted the disease was not very contagious. It generally attacks animals that are in low condition in the fall of the year or winter, and nine-tenths of them get well in the spring of their own accord, when the grass is growing, and they regain their flesh and strength.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that in past years, before we commenced the investigation of the subject, it was a very common thing to see cattle with scabies at stock yards.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Department of Agriculture has never taken any notice of it until a year or two past. It is a new thing with the Department of Agriculture. The gentleman has got it mixed with some other disease.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to remind the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] of the fact that in the hearings on the agricultural appropriation bill two years ago the attention of the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry was directed to this particular disease of cattle—the scabies—and the request was then made of him that he submit a statement showing where this disease was to be found in the western section of our country and the extent and degree of its prevalence. He spoke of its presence in Texas, and I will state that I have been interested in the cattle business to a limited degree for some time myself and, like the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], I have never seen a case of scabies in all my life. And last year, on the occasion mentioned by me, when the Chief of the Bureau of Animal Industry made his showing to the committee, we were all astonished at the very small number of cattle that he could find affected with scabies, and he collected data from all of the reports that had come into his Bureau from its employees who are looking after this disease and there were comparatively few cases. Absolutely the whole situation has been exaggerated, in my opinion, and I do not hesitate to state it that, in my deliberate judgment, a large part of this fund is used to give a lot of peripatetic gentlemen standing jobs in the western section of our country and that they serve no substantial or good purpose.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I do not question the judgment or the knowledge or the integrity of the distinguished chairman of the committee. But I do hold that the Secretary of Agriculture and Doctor Melvin have some knowledge also of what money is necessary for inspection. I do know that in some of these States where a quarantine has been established it is impossible to pass a critter across the State line, and the people that have the cattle are absolutely unable to dispose of them. I know that cholera hogs are being sold, and I know that the meat consumers are complaining. And to deny this appropriation is simply to say to the meat consumers of this country that "You are now to continue to eat the cholera punk and the diseased meat." It is for Congress now to decide.

Are you going to say to the people of the various States that "You are not going to be permitted to sell the stock?" Are you going to say to the packers that are in business in competition with the trusts that are supplied with these inspectors, "We will see that you are not given a market for your products?" Packing concerns have these inspectors. They are able to sell the meat. The smaller concerns that have no inspectors are unable to sell it, inasmuch as the retailer prefers to buy the meat that has been inspected. And it is not only an injustice to the cattle growers of this country, but it is a discrimination against the smaller packers, and it is an imposition on the meat consumers. That is all I care to say about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me emphasize one fact which the gentleman overlooked. In the allotment of the Committee on Appropriations for the Bureau of Animal Industry, they allotted $398,000 for scabies in cattle and in sheep. I claim that that is an excess allotment, and that you can use the money for ante-mortem and post-mortem examinations of the meats.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman knows that these are estimates, and if that money is not needed for this purpose it can be used for other purposes. I challenge the statement made by the distinguished chairman, that this appropriation has been increased $142,000 over last year. In all fairness, I think he should have stated that we appropriated $63,000 only a few days ago, which should be deducted from the $142,000, and that the Secretary's statement is that the Department is in need of money at the present time to carry on this inspection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why?

Mr. HAUGEN. And this must be made immediately available.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why has he not got money enough? If you will not state, I will.

Mr. HAUGEN. I take the statement of the Secretary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was directed by law to allot that appropriation by quarters. He allotted $400,000 to the first quarter—I am speaking in round numbers—$400,000 for the second quarter, $400,000 for the third quarter, and that left him $200,600 for the fourth quarter. Now, he did not allot it share and share alike for each quarter. If it was absolutely needed, it is here for Congress to determine whether it was or not, but we appropriated $63,000 more.

Mr. HAUGEN. And he asked for $134,000, and he ought to have had exactly what he asked for. Now, the fact that we appropriated $134,000 less than was needed last year is no reason why we should repeat the error.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. This amendment is an increase of the total appropriation. Now, I notice a provision in the bill that not more than $100,000 of the sum hereby appropriated shall be used for the microscopic inspection and certification of pork for export.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the Secretary's own amendment, I would say to the gentleman from Illinois. He proposed that amendment. That comes from the Department.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is satisfied that that will be sufficient?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I take it that the Department knows what it needed or it would not have written the amendment in that way.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman himself has some opinion?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think it is.

Mr. MANN. That is satisfactory to me. I notice a further provision on page 15—a proviso limiting the investigation. Is that intended to investigate human beings also?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a typographical error, which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] will correct. We were going to correct it at the proper time.

Mr. MANN. I simply asked for information.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I desire to make a correction on page 15.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is not in order now until we dispose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask that the amendment may be again read, so that the committee may understand what it is.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to amend, on page 15, line 8, after the word "prevalent," by inserting the following words "among domestic animals," in order to make the paragraph read as it was intended to read originally.

The Clerk read as follows.

Page 15, line 8, after the word "prevalent," insert the words "among domestic animals."

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it will be apparent that the words are necessary in order to make the paragraph at all sensible. Of course it is known the Bureau of Animal Industry only deals with domestic animals, or animals, but by an omission there, or by a misprint or otherwise, the words "among domestic animals" were left out. I think the House can readily see the importance of the amendment, if they feel like adopting the paragraph at all.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the time of the committee to discuss a provision beginning on line 22:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be authorized to expend of the amount hereby appropriated, through the dairy division of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, a sum not to exceed $20,000 in further developing the dairy industry of the Southern States by conducting experiments, holding institutes, and giving object lessons in cooperation with individual dairymen and State experiment stations."

I only wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that that provision of the bill carries the gist and meaning of a bill which I introduced on the 20th of January, which was referred to the Agricultural Committee, and I shall to-day only ask the indulgence of the House to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina to extend his remarks in the RECORD. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a few observations upon the very familiar and much mooted subject of free seeds, and make the formal amendment to strike out the last word for that purpose.

As I understand, the amendment that is proposed to be offered providing for free seeds for Congressional distribution will have to run the gantlet of a point of order. Therefore I desire to say what little I propose to say upon this proposition at this time.

We find a very large and very varied assortment of communications in the line of antiseed propaganda collected by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and inserted in the RECORD of April 26.

It will be found, upon an inspection of this collection, that nearly everything, aside from an occasional editorial in the Washington Post, comes from people who are interested in the sale of seeds.

There is just one little specimen which forms an apt illustration of this general class of communications, to which I want briefly to call the attention of the committee. It comes from a gentleman by the name of Ribsam—one Martin C. Ribsam—and is addressed to the Hon. IRA WOOD, M. C., one of the Members of this House. It is printed on page 5956 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and reads as follows:

Hon. IRA WOOD, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I understand the bill to abolish the free distribution of seeds and plants is about to be presented before your honorable body.

If you can see your way clear by casting your vote to abolish the same, I will appreciate it very much.

First. Free seeds are injurious to my business, by the Government giving seeds to consumers.

I do not think it is necessary to read any of the other reasons assigned in this production, Mr. Chairman. In my judgment, the one reason which I have just read is just about the milk in the cocoanut of this antiseed crusade. Every communication in that list, with the exception, I repeat, of an occasional editorial in the Washington Post, is from some seed salesman, or some one directly or indirectly interested in the business.

Now, we all recognize the Washington Post as a great paper. The Post itself will make no denial of this. It has been of great service to me. I should call it my friend. It has exercised a chastening influence, a refining and uplifting influence I know, over my not very lengthy and largely varied political life, by what I must assume to be an inwardly kind, but outwardly caustic, criticism, and gentle excoriation of all my errors and shortcomings—all that I have, and some, I think, that I do not have, every year or so. [Laughter.] I take it for granted its biennial prediction of my defeat for Congress will be due and come along in about sixty or ninety days from this date. [Laughter.]

That also has been to me a source of considerable good and helpfulness in the past when I have been a candidate before. It aroused my people to action when there was an apathetic sort of feeling among the voters which otherwise might have lost me to Congress.

But with all this I have never yet been able to concede, and can not bring myself to the point of conceding now, that the Washington Post—great organ and leader of thought as it is—would be considered an expert authority on soils and seeds and kindred subject-matters along the agricultural line; and I think I may pass by, without any serious consideration, the opinions of that and other great metropolitan journals upon this matter of soils and seeds and similar subjects which enter into the life and the occupation of the farmer, about which I think they know little or nothing of practical advantage.

Mr. LAMB. Did you read that little communication in the Washington Post this morning?

Mr. MUDD. No; I stand here in my place and plead guilty to the charge of not having yet read the Washington Post of this morning. I shall do so, however, just as soon as this little deliverance of mine shall have been finished.

Mr. MURDOCK. My experience has been that the garden seeds furnished by the Government create a demand for other seeds which are purchased from seed dealers. Probably of the two or three thousand people to whom I furnish seeds, many of whom would not otherwise buy seeds, a considerable number, after they get a little start on a garden, go and buy more seed. Does the gentleman think that the letter which he has quoted makes out a good case on that point?

Mr. MUDD. I do not think that any man makes out a good case who asks a Member of Congress to vote against a general distribution of seeds by the Government on the ground that it hurts his particular private business. I consider a request of that character an impudent and arrogant assumption as to the conception of public duty by a Congressman, which ought to be rebuked by adverse action upon the request. When it is understood that such a feeling of private interest as that is about the underlying principle of almost all these prayerful appeals for opposition to free seed that we get here, it ought to impress people from the rural districts, if they had any doubt before, that they ought to sustain the proposition looking to the continuance of the Congressional distribution of seeds.

Mr. Chairman, the opposition to this provision, which contemplates an appropriation of $200,000, comes in this House, so far as I have been able to observe it, in the main, from Members who represent city constituencies. Of course I have great respect for the opinions of these gentlemen. It comes, from time to time, too, from Members who represent rich constituencies in the country, who do not need and do not want these seeds, who do not write for them, but frequently write to their Congressmen to send them something else of rarer and greater value. It is the wealth of these people, which my constituents and the constituents of most country Members here do not possess, that makes the cost of seeds no serious object of consideration to them.

If the ground of the opposition to this contemplated provision is that the constituencies of the various Members do not want these seeds—and that has, in almost every case, been stated or been known to be the reason—then, per contra, a Member in my position ought to vote, and should feel in duty bound to vote, for the incorporation of such a provision in the bill.

My constituents do want the seeds. I stand with my constituents. I propose to get for them, as far as I can, just what they want, and just what they feel that they need. The people of my district—the rural sections of it, I mean—I am sorry to say, are, in very large measure, farmers of moderate means, truck gardeners, and laborers, whose only worldly possessions consist of a little house and an acre or two of ground. It is for these people, particularly the last-named class of them, that, with consistency and earnestness of conviction, I shall vote to continue this distribution, which it has been the policy of the Government to provide for for several decades, at least, in the past.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. MUDD. I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, we vote millions of dollars at the request of our city friends upon this floor—and I always expect to vote in favor of these appropriations—for magnificent public buildings that are erected in the great cities, and only in the cities. If we were to vote only for such buildings, for buildings requiring only such expenditures, as were absolutely and urgently necessary, I apprehend the structures that now cost a million dollars might be erected for less than a hundred thousand dollars.

Some one has made reference to the appropriation for battle ships. We do appropriate munificent sums for battle ships. I take it for granted we will continue to make such appropriations. We spend more than the amount which we would appropriate to supply this item, more than the sum of $200,000, for decorations of the interior of battle ships. I have voted for these items before and I expect to vote for them again, because I believe in a broad and liberal policy on the part of the Government, to typify the greatness of the United States in such concrete forms as are illustrated by magnificent public buildings on land and by magnificent battle ships to ride the seas.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, when we come to this little pittance of $200,000 these gentlemen grow indignant and arouse themselves to a highly ecstatic state of public virtue in their attempt to save the public money. They want to protect the Government from an expenditure of $200,000 for the people of the country who feel the least, and who are the last to feel, the helping hand of Government expenditures, and then ask for these appropriations of one million or two million of dollars for splendid structures in their city homes.

It has been said in the newspapers and said in this debate that there is a species of "graft" involved in this little expenditure.

Mr. Chairman, if the $200,000 which we propose to expend here in distributing free agricultural seeds to the small farmers and laborers and gardeners of this country shall be found to be the only evidence and extent of "graft" in and around this Capitol, I opine that the people of the United States will not feel seriously called upon with grave concern to fear the loss of the integrity of their Representatives here in the Congress of the United States. I do not think it is in this quarter of expenditure that we will make successful finds in our graft-hunting investigations.

It is said that the Department of Agriculture has at last come to the conclusion that these seeds are worthless. Many Members on the floor are opposed to the distribution of seeds because, as they say, they are worthless.

Mr. Chairman, if it has come to this, that the great Department of Agriculture, with the Treasury of the United States behind it, can not provide improved seeds, can not provide useful and valuable seeds, as improved and as useful and as valuable as are the seeds that are found in the ordinary crossroads stores throughout the country, then the wrong must be laid at the door of the Agricultural Department, and we shall want to look into and bolster up the work of that Department until it can provide and distribute valuable seeds to the farmers—better seeds than they can purchase in the ordinary channels of commerce.

I find another little instance of opposition to these seeds, which further illustrates the trifling character of the opposition.

I notice a statement here in this rich collection of antiseed literature from a postmaster of a little town called Duane, in the State of Virginia. He signs himself R. G. Tyler. I do not know whether a Member of Congress or some one else suggested the propriety of his writing such a letter and uttering such a wail of lamentation over the burdens of the free-seed distribution. I take it for granted that to some extent the arduous labors of that distinguished official were increased just a little bit without a corresponding augmentation of his salary, because of the work of distribution of these seeds, which it is his duty, under the law, to distribute, and distribute faithfully and promptly, to those to whom they are sent.

Mr. LAMB. He is the only postmaster in Virginia that thinks as he does.

Mr. MUDD. Then perhaps he is the only one that ought to be removed from office for writing a communication of this kind. [Laughter.]

Furthermore, Mr. Chairman, we have been told that the Post-Office Department is against this seed distribution.

This is not the only way in which many of us have observed a tendency upon the part of certain officials to minimize and to disparage what they seem to consider as an offensive sort of prestige attaching to the position of a Congressman. Mr. Chairman, I know that there has been a growing feeling in some quarters in the last year or two that Congressmen are, in fact, a very inferior class of beings, the evil of whose existence, because it can not be cured, must, forsooth, be endured, but curtailed as far as practicable. For one I want the Departments and bureaus of the Government to know—and if I had no other reason for voting for this appropriation, I would vote for it to serve notice upon them that the legislative branch of this Government is not made for and is not subject to the Executive Departments, but that the Departments are created to carry out the mandates of the legislative branch of the Government.

For myself I want to say that I shall vote for this appropriation, even if you call it a bounty. There is no bounty that could be voted that would give greater encouragement to the ordinary objects of that form of Government donation. I would vote for it if you call it a subsidy. There could be no subsidy that we could vote that would be productive of greater good to to a greater number. I would vote for it—yes, I would vote for it even if you put it upon the plain, bald ground of an expenditure of $200,000 as a contribution to the contentment of the poor man of this land who receives the seeds, who wants them, who needs them, and who receives substantial benefit from them, and who gives in return an added feeling of interest in his Government, an added feeling of affection for his Government, in that, from his point of view, the Government has seen fit, in even so slight a way, to remember him and to contribute, in even so slight a way, to lighten the burdens of his life's labors and expenditures. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The object I have in endeavoring to keep out of this appropriation bill the item for the free distribution of seeds is one that none of the gentlemen seem to have touched upon here. These items in this bill are in the interest of the agricultural people of this country. Now, gentlemen are always calling for proof, and I would like to have them present a resolution of any grange or organization of farmers that are in favor of this proposition. There may be some, but I want to hear from them.

Mr. CURRIER. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say that I have received sixty-six letters from granges. One grange opposes the distribution; sixty granges returned thanks for the seeds, and in many cases they adopted formal resolutions of thanks. [Applause.] I have received more than 500 letters from farmers, and 99 out of 100 say that these seeds are valuable to them, and that they get good results and new varieties.

Mr. COCKS. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to hear that the farmers in some States appreciate that, but in my own State——

Mr. CURRIER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman challenged proof.

Mr. COCKS. Certainly. I would like to have the resolution presented, but not a speech. I am perfectly willing to hear it if my time is not curtailed.

Mr. CURRIER. Oh, the gentleman can get what time he needs.

Mr. COCKS. Very well; if the gentleman wants to read it, I have no objection.

Mr. CURRIER. I want to read a very short letter—only a few lines. It is as follows:

Thank you, ever so much, for the seeds. I will put them where they will be most appreciated. I think the girls will most appreciate the flower seeds. We often wondered why the flower seeds were never sent out. There are many wives who would be so pleased with some, and too often the farmers think it too much to get any for them.

Sincerely,

MRS. KEEZER.

Mr. COCKS. Well, that is not an official communication from any organization of farmers.

Mr. CURRIER. I have sixty-five of those that I have just spoken of.

Mr. COCKS. I did not know there were so many granges in the gentleman's State. That is all right. I know that the State Grange of the great State of New York is opposed to it, and I have here the letter of the master of the grange, and I for myself, speaking as a farmer, am and have been always opposed to this free distribution of seeds. Now, so far as the attitude of the farmers of this country is concerned, I am satisfied that the intelligent farmers of the country, the men who really go to make up the great mass of the farming community, are entirely opposed to the free distribution of these common garden seeds.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, that is where the gentleman is badly mistaken; just as badly as he ever was in anything in his life.

Mr. COCKS. Oh, I decline to yield any further. I have a limited time. The gentleman may make a speech in his own time.

Mr. SULLOWAY rose.

Mr. COCKS. Is it a question or a speech? I would be very glad to answer any question that I could.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I would ask why the farmers of this country are opposed to the distribution of seeds.

Mr. COCKS. Because they do not think it necessary or proper business for the Government to distribute these free seeds. That is why.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied my colleague will yield to one question.

Mr. COCKS. Yes.

Mr. LAMB. Of the 7,000,000 farmers in this country what proportion belong to the granges?

Mr. COCKS. I could not tell you that.

Mr. LAMB. Well, that is the question.

Mr. COCKS. I am only speaking for those I am acquainted with in a good many States, and I am speaking for my part of the country particularly, and I hope that the other gentlemen will speak, and some of them have, for their parts of the country. And I want to say I am very sorry the farmers have not been here to see the solicitude of their friends for them. It might be that they could gather from the RECORD some of the "mystery of their meaning," but not the "awfulness of their mien" in discussing this subject.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think there will be any failure on the part of the farmers to learn about the solicitude of the Members for them here? [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKS. I think not. I think every man will have his speech duly sent out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COCKS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks for five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Oh, no, no. The gentleman only wants five.

Mr. COCKS. Yes; I want ten.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York may be extended for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw the objection. I desire to have the time extended to fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his objection. Is there further objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKS. Mr. Chairman, in the first place those people here who are advocating the various propositions are always quoting the Secretary of Agriculture upon this question. I have here a letter from the Secretary which I desire to read. His letter is as follows:

I have your letter of the 6th, asking my views on the free distribution of seeds. I had something on this subject in my last annual report to the Congress for 1903, and as I do not think I can state it any better than I did then I send you a copy of the paragraph herein. I am of the same opinion still.

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

I will not read that particular paragraph from the report, because gentlemen are familiar with it. In any event he is opposed to the free distribution of common garden seeds. I have here also a letter from the Bureau of Farmers' Institutes in my State, from the director, and he says that he does not know of any farmers' organization in my State that is in favor of this free disposition of seeds. I have here a letter from the master of the State grange, which I will read:

I take this opportunity of addressing you in regard to the free-seed distribution. It seems to me that this is the proper time to cut off this needless and wasteful use of public money. For myself, and for the Order of Patrons of Husbandry, numbering 70,000 members in the State of New York, I wish to enter a protest against any further distribution of common seeds by the Federal Government. So far as the distribution of new and rare varieties of seeds is concerned, I think there is no objection to that, but the practice of sending common seeds should be stopped.

GEORGE A. FULLER, Master.

I have several other communications here from various associations.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKS. No; I do not like to yield now, because I would like to yield all at once. These communications are from the Horticultural Society of New York, from the Sheep Breeders' Association, from the Poultry Breeders' Association, and others.

Now, then, I have here in my hand a letter from almost every agricultural paper of any prominence in the United States. Now, the other side seeks to detract from the value of this source of evidence, because there are seed advertisements in them. Certainly there are seed advertisements in them, but do you not think they have as much consideration for their subscribers as for their advertisers? Their advertisers would not stay with them if their subscribers did not. You know that perfectly well. I have one from the Southern Cultivator, of Atlanta, Ga. I do not think it is necessary to read them, but I will read this as a sample, as it is short:

THE SOUTHERN CULTIVATOR AND DIXIE FARMER,
Atlanta, Ga., March 27, 1906.

Mr. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your inquiry received in regard to the distribution of seed. We beg to say that the Southern Cultivator has very few views on the subject. We all know that seeds distributed are worthless and only given as soft soap by Members of the House who desire to be reelected.

Yours, very truly,

THE CULTIVATOR PUBLISHING CO.,
T. P. HUNNICUTT, Manager.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman——

Mr. COCKS. No; I do not yield. I will in a minute, to answer all kinds of questions. I also have one from the Farm and Ranch, of Dallas, Tex., also in the same line.

FARM AND RANCH,
Dallas, Tex., March 19, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Will say in reply to your letter of the 13th instant that for many years we have fought the policy of the Agricultural Department in the free distribution of common garden seeds, believing that it was never the intention of the Government to send out seeds in this way. It is right and eminently proper that the Department should experiment with new and valuable seeds and plants, but it seems to us that there would be just as much sense in giving a man an overcoat as there is in giving him common garden seed. However, if the Government should ever undertake to supply the people with overcoats, we trust that the quality will be much better than the quality of the seed they have been distributing.

Yours, very truly,

FARM AND RANCH,
F. P. HOLLAND, General Manager.

I have one from the Southern Ruralist, of Atlanta, Ga., which is of the same tenor, signed by the editor.

SOUTHERN RURALIST,
Atlanta, Ga., March 15, 1906.

Mr. WILLIAM COCKS,
Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of recent date referring to the free distribution of garden seeds by the Department. In reply would say that I am not only the editor of an agricultural paper, but a farmer and gardener as well. I have been the recipient of these free seeds for years, and they have never been of any benefit to me. In fact, they are usually given to the kids on the place to experiment on. I do not know of a single instance where any farmer has received any practical good from this free-seed distribution, and it involves an enormous expense by the Government and a great burden on the post-office, which is certainly not warranted.

If the original intention of the law governing this free-seed distribution was carried out and the Department confined themselves to sending out new and rare varieties in sufficient quantities to be of some really practical benefit to the farmers, we would be heartily in favor of it; but the sending out of old varieties of seeds in little dabs is of no benefit to the recipient, and does, in some instances, work a hardship on the seed merchants in the different parts of the country. I certainly trust that Congress at the present session will abolish this free distribution. There are thousands of people opposed to it throughout the country, and we know of no single instance where anyone has said a word in favor of it.

Very truly, yours,

SOUTHERN RURALIST COMPANY.
F. J. MERRIAM, Editor.

I have one from the Breeder's Gazette, of Chicago, also along the same line, signed by the vice-president of the association.

THE BREEDER'S GAZETTE,
Chicago, March 16, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering yours of the 13th, I inclose my editorial paragraph in our issue of March 7 on the free-seed proposition. We have argued for years over columns of space in favor of the abolition of the free-seed distribution, and I did not think it necessary to go into the subject at length. I will say another word on the subject next week.

Yours,

W. R. GOODMAN, Jr., Vice-President.

I also have a letter from the manager of immigration of Virginia, who is opposed to that proposition.

Mr. LAMB. What is his name?

Mr. COCKS. His name is Weiss.

Mr. LAMB. You sent him down there.

Mr. COCKS. All right; I did not know where he came from, but I would like to say to the gentleman you are asking us to send other people, too.

Mr. LAMB. But we want those people to work.

Mr. COCKS. I hope he is working. Now, if the gentleman desires, we will be pleased to recall him and send one who will work. I have no sympathy for loafers.

Mr. LAMB. He is a first-rate fellow, but, like you, he is misguided.

Mr. COCKS. Well, I have a whole lot of company right in this House. [Laughter and applause.]

EMPORIA, VA., March 15, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 13th, will say that I go in with you in trying to abolish the free distribution of common garden seeds. I hope that the committee of Representatives will command such action.

Respectfully, yours,

H. W. WEISS,
Manager of Immigration.

I have a letter here from the Kansas Farmer, to show you these come from all over the country.

KANSAS FARMER,
Topeka, Kans., March 9, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of March 7, referring to the matter of the proposed abolishment of the free-seed distribution as relating to garden seeds. The Kansas Farmer is heartily in favor of such abolishment. This distribution is a graft on the Government, an imposition on seed dealers, and a fraud on the recipient of such seed in a great many cases. It is greatly to be hoped that Congress will revise the above, and abolish the distribution of such seed as can be obtained through the regular channels.

Yours, very truly, E. B. COWGILL, Editor.

I have a letter here from the Ranch and Range, of Denver, which is also along the same line.

DENVER, COLO., March 16, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your esteemed favor of the 13th instant, wherein you solicit our views on the question of free distribution of common garden seeds, permit us to say that we are just on the point of writing an editorial on this question, a synopsis of which is, that it is a needless expenditure of $100,000 of the people's money, much of the seed being sent to town and city people, who consign them to the waste basket, while that sent direct to the farmers is often illy adapted to his needs, climatic conditions, etc., not being taken into consideration, and on the whole it is regarded by the people in general as a kind of perquisite or, as our western people would term it, graft, by which the legislators scheme to make themselves solid with their constituents. We assure you that if this needless expenditure of the people's money were discontinued and the money so wasted devoted to some phase of the development of our agricultural and live-stock resources, it would meet with the general approval of the people throughout the country.

Thanking you for the courtesy of asking our views on this subject and hoping that such laws may be enacted that much of the needless expenditure may be discontinued and the Government placed on a practical business basis, we are,

Yours, very truly,

RANCH AND RANGE,
By H. S. GROVES,
Editor and Manager.

Also from the Southern Farm Gazette, of Starkville, Miss., signed by the editor:

THE SOUTHERN FARM GAZETTE,
Starkville, Miss., March 16, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This replies to your favor of March 13. I am certainly glad the Committee on Agriculture favors the abolition of the free distribution of the common garden seeds. The Southern Farm Gazette would have before this given the matter more attention if an unusual demand from our subscribers for information about crops, fertilizers, and improved methods of cultivation had not prevented it.

I am firmly convinced that the abolition of this free distribution of seeds will make for better and more profitable gardening throughout the whole country. Besides reducing the yield of really desirable crops of what ought to be produced, this distribution of seed causes an unwarranted expense. The loss that the postal department suffers from this cause should be avoided and the saving used to extend rural free delivery if there is no other use for it.

Our next issue will not appear before April 1, and I fear that will be too late to aid the cause. If not, I should be glad to be so informed as soon as possible, so that our 12,500 of real farmers can profitably have some facts placed before them.

Very truly, yours, CHAS. M. SCHERER,
Editor Southern Farm Gazette.

I have one from the Twentieth Century Farmer, of Omaha:

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FARMER,
Omaha, Nebr., March 29, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Several days ago we received a letter from you asking our views on the subject of the abolishment of the distribution of common garden seeds by the Department of Agriculture. I inclose herewith the editorial page of the Twentieth Century Farmer, with a marked editorial on free-seed distribution, which expresses our views on this subject.

In former issues of the Twentieth Century Farmer we have gone into this matter more in detail, but this editorial expresses in a few words what we think of the present method of Government free-seed distribution.

Very sincerely, yours, T. F. STURGESS, Editor.

Also one from Farm Life, of Chicago:

FARM LIFE,
Chicago, Ill., March 20, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of recent date in regard to our position on the free distribution of common garden seeds, we will say that we do not favor the proposition. It seems to us like an unwarranted subsidy, which can not fail to injure the seedsmen of the United States, and in too many cases we are inclined to believe that the farmers do not consider the seeds valuable.

Trusting that this will make our position clear to you and your committee, we are,

Very truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 13th, I beg to say that I shall have something to say on the subject of the free distribution of garden seeds in the April issue of The Farmers' Voice and will send you a marked copy for your criticism. Without going into the matter herein, I will add that we are in favor of the abolishment of this practice and any movement to this end will have our support.

Very truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: Replying to your favor of the 13th instant, beg to say that I am entirely in sympathy with the action of the Committee on Agriculture in regard to the free-seed distribution, and have just written an editorial on the subject, and will send copies to the Members of the House from this State. If the farmers of this country would get after their Members at this time, I believe that it would have a splendid effect. It is a waste of public money and has been for years. No one wants these free seeds, as they are usually worthless, and the Government has no more right to give them away than barb wire or horse blankets. More than this, it has a tendency to educate the people toward graft.

With best wishes for the success of the measure, I am,

Very truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: We thank you for your kind letter of March 13, and wish to say that we have expressed ourselves editorially regarding the abolishment of free distribution of the common garden seeds. It is getting to be a chestnut, as we have published articles regarding it for several years almost monthly. We are with you in this matter; go ahead and do something.

Most truly, yours, THE RURAL CALIFORNIAN.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We heartily indorse the action of the Committee on Agriculture of the House in regard to abolishing the free-seed distribution, and we have strenuously advocated it for years past in the Ohio Farmer. We regard it as an unnecessary waste of public money and a great injury to seedsmen. When first adopted it was justified by existing conditions; now there is no excuse for it. Congress has the same right to distribute farm implements and machinery and live stock as it has to distribute seeds. It is an unjust discrimination against an important industry. All the common seeds, such as are distributed through Congress, can be obtained at every store or grocery and are cheap. Let the Department of Agriculture introduce, test, and distribute new and useful varieties from abroad. This is all that is needed.

Yours, respectfully,

THE EDITORS.

DEAR SIR: We have before us your valued favor of March 13 and have carefuly noted contents.

We are very much opposed to the giving away of seeds, as has been the custom in the past. We believe it is wrong and an imposition and that the practice should be stopped.

Yours, sincerely,

JAMES SLOCUM.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did you write to these men?

Mr. COCKS. I wrote and asked their position.

Mr. LAMB. That explains it.

Mr. COCKS. Is not that a pretty good way of getting information?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you any letters from the laboring man who goes out with a grubbing hoe and works in the soil instead of working the air?

Mr. COCKS. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have fifty here right from the soil.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Give me some from a fellow who has cockleburs in his hair and knows what it is to till the soil himself.

Mr. COCKS. I could not satisfy you on this question if I gave you everything, anyhow. I also have a letter here from the editor of the Topeka Mail and Breeze, a well-known paper in the State of Kansas:

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 13, 1906.

Editor of Mail and Breeze, Topeka, Kans.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: You have perhaps noticed by the papers that an effort is being made to abolish the free distribution of the common garden seeds. The Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives will recommend such action. Would be glad to have your views on the subject, and, if you are in favor of the proposition, to have you do what you can toward helping it along.

Yours, truly,

WILLIAM W. COCKS.

I am decidedly opposed to the free-seed graft. It is wrong in principle. It costs the Government lots of money, and there is no benefit to anyone.

ARTHUR CAPPER.

I have also one from the secretary of the New York State Grange confirming the statement from the master:

NEW YORK STATE GRANGE, P. OF H.,
Skaneateles, N. Y., February 15, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 13th received and noted. The State Grange did take action relative to the free-seed distribution. They are unanimously opposed to it and have been for a long time. They look upon it as a very useless and extravagant thing to do. Our legislative committee would be pleased to call on any committee at Washington and express these views at any time.

Yours, respectfully,

W. N. GILES.

I also have one here from the Fruit Growers' Association; then one from the Farm and Fireside, of Springfield, Ohio; one from Minneapolis; one from the Michigan Farmer; one from Detroit; one from the Farmer, of St. Paul, Minn.; one from the Tribune, Sioux City, Iowa; and one from the New Haven Farmer, New Haven, Conn.; also a communication from Mr. Jordan, of the Agricultural Experiment Station, Geneva, N. Y.; also one from the editor of the Rural New Yorker, of New York; the Rural Home, of New York; also one from the editor of the Farm Journal, of Philadelphia; also one from the Orange Judd Company. I also have a letter from one of the most successful florists in my country, a man who is an authority on carnations and peonies, who is a member of the board of control at Geneva Experiment Station, New York, which is along the same line. I also have one letter from a constituent of mine, and I can say that I have one consistent man in my district, at least. He says:

I am strictly opposed to the free distribution of seed by the United States Government, and have returned to the Department of Agriculture the package received through your courtesy.

CHARLES H. ALLEN.

Mr. MANN. Is he a publisher, too?

Mr. COCKS. He is a florist. He is not a seedman. He is a "farmer under glass," as we call him.

Mr. MANN. He is not an editor of any paper which is enjoying the second-class mail graft? He has not returned any of that, I suppose?

Mr. COCKS. If the gentleman will only not consume my time——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman consumed some of mine.

Mr. COCKS. I had forgotten that courtesy.

I also have a letter from a farmer in my district by the name of S. F. McDonald, along this same line. I also have here clippings from various other agricultural papers, where I did not receive communications directly from the editor. I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include those.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COCKS. In one minute, and I will answer all kinds of questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman's time be extended. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have as much time as he desires.

Mr. COCKS. I do not want but little more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue his remarks for five minutes longer. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask a question?

Mr. COCKS. Yes, sir; certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Those letters and matters you have read were sent to you by these gentlemen because they recognized you as the chief advocate of the abolishment of the seed distribution in this bill?

Mr. COCKS. I do not know. They were in response to inquiries as to their views. I can show the gentleman a copy of my letter.

Mr. BARTLETT. Did you not make a motion in the committee room by which the seed business was ruled out?

Mr. COCKS. I simply wrote them a courteous letter, asking for their views. I have a copy of the letter somewhere which I will show the gentleman if I can find it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Doubtless the gentleman is the champion of the proposition to prevent any further distribution of seed?

Mr. COCKS. Common garden seed? Oh, certainly; yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is for that reason, I apprehend, that these letters and articles were sent to you?

Mr. COCKS. They were sent to me. I asked their views, and they were sent to me on that account.

Mr. RUCKER. I understood the gentleman to read a letter a few moments ago from one of his constituents advising him that the package of seed received had been returned to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. COCKS. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Then I infer the gentleman used his quota of vegetable seed?

Mr. COCKS. I did.

Mr. RUCKER. And only one package was regretted and returned?

Mr. COCKS. That is the only one, I think. A good many of my constituents would a great deal rather have jackknives, a set of colors, or a compass, or an anchor, or something of that kind.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman try to get those things on?

Mr. COCKS. No; but that is an attitude of human nature.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RUCKER. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. How many letters had you?

Mr. COCKS. I think about thirty or forty; I had answers from nearly every one of them.

Mr. WILSON. Were they all opposed?

Mr. COCKS. All that answered were opposed, and all the editorials in the papers were opposed.

Mr. WILSON. Did you get any letters that were not opposed?

Mr. COCKS. No; I have not got one. Every answer that I received was opposed to the free distribution. Now, I will answer the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has the gentleman examined publications of the editors whose letters here were read to see whether or not they are filled up with advertisements of seed men?

Mr. COCKS. I assume that they all have seed advertisements. I assume that the seed business is a legitimate business, and I assume that the editors of those papers are as careful of their subscribers as they are of their advertisers. That is the position I take in the matter.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKS. Certainly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that all the letters you have are replies to a letter that you have written to the parties?

Mr. COCKS. Most of them are.

Mr. FORDNEY. Did you get any letters that you did not write for?

Mr. COCKS. Yes; I got six or seven or eight. I think I had six, seven, or eight private letters sent me from parties who did not know I was interested in the matter, calling my attention to the fact that the proposition was to be made and asking my support.

Mr. FORDNEY. Were you not aware that in writing to those parties you were sure what their replies would be?

Mr. COCKS. I had not; I had only taken the proposition up in this way, and I have no personal interest in the matter.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. COCKS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan if he regards it as pertinent in the consideration of a question, if a man reads a letter, that the party has responded simply because another party has asked him to reply?

Mr. FORDNEY. Any man can find trouble by looking for it.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Let me ask the gentleman another question. Does he not know that nearly every great agricultural journal in the United States is opposed to the Congressional distribution of seeds?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. And opposed to it largely because the sentiment of their subscribers is in accordance with that of the Department? [Cries of "No."]

Mr. FORDNEY. I know of no opposition to the proposition at all except that which comes from the seed dealers. [Loud applause.]

Mr. COCKS. Mr. Chairman, so far as that is concerned——

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield just for one moment?

Mr. COCKS. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. For the information of the gentleman from Michigan, which I have no doubt he will accept with the grace that he always accepts information, I want to say to him that the Roundtop Farmers' Institute organization, at its last meeting, in March, composed of 700 to 1,000 farmers, representing the best farming sentiment of the State of Wisconsin, the men who toil in the soil and work with their hands, who believe in farming, and respect the dignity of the farmers' profession, unanimously voted against this Congressional seed distribution. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. And yet they are in favor of the oleomargarine graft. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKS. I want to say to you, and to the House, that I believe that that is true of the farmers' organizations anywhere, and I am surprised at what gentlemen said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may be allowed to proceed for five minutes more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COCKS. I will never finish my remarks if I yield any more.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman this——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. COCKS. No; I can not yield now. When I finish my remarks the gentleman can ask me any question he desires in his own time. I have already imposed upon the good nature of the House. I have had too many favors granted me already to ask for any more. I just want to say that when gentlemen speak of the agricultural papers of the country, those letters I have read are from agricultural papers. Now, the question is about the things that the farmer wants to have done instead of distributing free garden seed. That which is of more interest to him, and which is the real question, is what they are doing in regard to new and rare seeds; what they are doing in searching along these lines in different countries for valuable new varieties. Now, that is the kind of work that the farmers of the United States are anxious that the Department of Agriculture shall do, and not peddle out common garden seed.

Now, so far as the seedmen's proposition is concerned, the principal seedman in my district has many times been very glad to sell to the Government large quantities of seed. He is not opposed to this proposition on that ground, for he has sold very large amounts of seed to the Government at different times.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is his name?

Mr. COCKS. So that that proposition is not necessarily all one way. These seeds nearly all come from the seed growers. Not half the seed dealers grow all the seeds that they send out.

Mr. SIMS. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the Government tests the seeds that it buys?

Mr. COCKS. I decline to yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York declines to yield.

Mr. COCKS. I propose to call the attention of the House to some of the things that have been done by the Agricultural Department, and to call attention to the fact that a great many valuable plants are now awaiting discovery by the Agricultural Department, especially in eastern Asia, whose climate is more nearly like ours than any other part of the world.

I ask leave to insert this as a part of my remarks. Now, I will yield to the question of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. I understood the gentleman to read a letter.

Mr. COCKS. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Which said that these seeds were worthless.

Mr. COCKS. Some of them are worthless, I believe.

Mr. SIMS. Did you say it?

Mr. COCKS. I can not quote from memory just exactly what every man said who wrote a letter.

Mr. SIMS. Don't you know that that statement is not true?

Mr. COCKS. I know that some of them are worthless.

Mr. SIMS. That letter said these seeds are worthless, did it not?

Mr. COCKS. Some of them are.

Mr. SIMS. And you have just admitted that these seed men sell a great many seeds to the Government.

Mr. COCKS. Of course they do. Anybody who has ever had any experience knows that there are a great many poor seeds in the very best that you can raise. Every time you try to raise a lot of seeds you get a lot of poor stuff. You know that just as well as I do.

Mr. SIMS. Does the Government test the seeds it buys?

Mr. COCKS. The Government tests for germination and sometimes for type, but not always. It can not test for type every year—as to whether the seeds are true to type or not. There is not time in a single year to test for the purpose of determining whether a radish seed is going to turn out a radish or a beet.

Mr. SIMS. Are not the seeds improved by the Government experts?

Mr. COCKS. Under this bill, the Government will continue to improve seeds as fast as it can, so far as concerns new and useful varieties. We want to increase that part of the Government work. That is what we want to do.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. COCKS. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. Did not Mr. Galloway say in the hearing before the committee that all the seeds were tested not only to determine germination, but also to determine trueness to type?

Mr. COCKS. If they do, then they are old seeds; that is all.

Mr. CANDLER. He testified to that.

Mr. COCKS. I don't remember that, but if he did they are old seeds; that is all.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that he was strongly in favor of that part of the appropriation for obtaining and testing new and rare seeds.

Mr. COCKS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why, then, did the gentleman's committee strike out most of the appropriation which has been used for that purpose?

Mr. COCKS. We do not strike it out. It is our proposition to insert an addition if this garden-seed proposition is stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that the committee now propose to change their report and to offer an amendment?

Mr. COCKS. The committee has always been in favor of the new and rare varieties.

Mr. MANN. Is it the proposition now to offer an amendment to the bill, admitting that the committee was wrong?

Mr. COCKS. No; not admitting that the committee was wrong, but substituting rare seeds for the common garden seeds.

Mr. MANN. I will repeat. I say the gentleman's committee, in the appropriation that is reported to the House, struck out a large sum of money which has heretofore been used for the very purpose which the gentleman now says is proper.

Mr. COCKS. If the gentleman will have patience I think the bill will be perfected.

Mr. MANN. I think the committee will perfect the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. COCKS. I hope they will.

Following are some of the letters and statements to which I have referred:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 7, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of the 6th, asking my views on the free distribution of seeds. I had something on this subject in my annual report to Congress for 1903, and as I do not think I can state it any better than I did then, I send you a copy of the paragraph herein. I am of the same opinion still.

Very truly, yours, JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF SEEDS AND PLANTS.

With regard to the securing and distributing of miscellaneous garden and flower seed, the fact remains that this work does not accomplish the ends for which the law was originally framed. There are collected, put up, and distributed now, on Congressional orders, nearly 40,000,000 packets of miscellaneous vegetable and flower seeds each year. These seeds are the best that can be obtained in the market, but from the fact that large numbers of packets are wanted the seed obtained can be of standard sorts only, such as are to be found everywhere for sale in the open market. As there is no practical object to be gained in distributing this kind of seed, it seems very desirable that some change be made. To this end it would seem wise to limit our work entirely to the securing and distributing of seeds, plants, etc., of new and rare sorts. There is still much to be done in the way of securing seeds, plants, etc., of this kind from abroad, but still more to be accomplished in careful investigations of our own possibilities in this direction. There are many valuable plants scattered all over this country which are still little known outside of their respective localities. These should be collected, tested, and distributed. There are also great possibilities of improving agricultural industries by distributing specially bred seeds and plants.

As the plant-breeding work of the Department increases opportunities for securing seed of this nature will accumulate. To do this work in the most effective manner, arrangements could be made in all cases to secure the advice and assistance of Senators and Representatives who have agricultural constituents. The Department has a well-organized force of scientists who are thoroughly familiar with the general conditions of soil and climate in nearly all parts of the country. Special crops could be selected for special purposes, and with the advice and cooperation of Members of Congress such crops could be placed where they would do the most good. This is a line of work that would result in very much more value to individual districts throughout the country than the distribution of a large quantity of common varieties of garden seed which have no particular merits so far as newness or promise are concerned. I shall inaugurate the coming year work along the lines here mentioned, and hope to receive the cooperation and aid of Congress in this matter. (Extract from Report of Secretary of Agriculture for 1903, issued December 1, 1903.)

[Progressive Farmer and Cotton Planter, Raleigh, N. C., March 15, 1906.]

THE FREE-SEED HUMBUG.

By a vote of 8 to 7, the Committee on Agriculture has cut out the appropriation of $240,000 for seed for free distribution. Now is time for Congress to stop the free-seed graft that has been going on for lo, these many years. How many people have been benefited by this free distribution of seed? The intention of the Government sending seed to the farmers over the country was good, but the plan has been so abused that next to nothing of benefit has been derived from it. The cost has been not only $240,000 per year for seed alone, but look at the extra expense incurred in handling them. The beneficiaries so far have been the seed houses, the extra number of clerks and officials necessary to carry on the work, and the railroads for hauling them.—Smithfield Herald.

[The Farmers' Voice and Rural Outlook, Evanston–Chicago, April, 1906.]

The time seems close at hand when the ancient and honorable custom of sending a constituent a package of garden seeds, to put him in proper voting frame of mind, will be put aside and filed in the archives of unwritten history as an experiment which was well meant in its origin, but pestiferous and obnoxious in its ending. It is no sacrifice in principle of the contention that a beneficent government should act in loco parentis to all its citizens. There are some things which can be done better by the people through Government channels than can be done for them by private control of corporations. All insurance should be furnished by the Government. The cost to policy holders would be reduced to the mere clerical expenses of the bureau and the credit would be A 1. The distribution of garden seeds as it has been followed is not a success, and the appropriation will very likely be omitted at this session of Congress.

[Washington Post, April 10, 1906.]

OPPOSED TO FREE SEEDS—SECRETARY WILSON SAYS NO GOOD RESULTS FROM DISTRIBUTION—NATIONAL GRANGE CONDEMNS PRACTICE, AS DO BRANCHES IN THE SEVERAL STATES.

As the impression prevails in some quarters that Secretary Wilson and the officials of the Agricultural Department favor a continuance of the free distribution of seeds, an inquiry was addressed to Dr. B. T. Galloway, chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, to which Doctor Galloway replied:

"The views of this Department, with reference to the distribution of miscellaneous vegetable and flower seeds, have been clearly set forth in our various reports. The attitude of the Department was stated by the Secretary in his report for 1903, extract from which I send inclosed."

The extract says: "With regard to securing and distributing miscellaneous garden and flower seeds, the fact remains that this work does not accomplish the ends for which the law was originally framed. There are collected, put up, and distributed now, on Congressional orders, nearly 40,000,000 packets of such seeds each year. These seeds are the best that can be obtained in the market, but from the fact that large numbers of packets are wanted, the seed obtained can be of standard sorts only, such as are to be found everywhere for sale in the open market. As there is no practical object to be gained in distributing this kind of seed, it seems desirable that some change be made. To this end, it would seem wise to limit our work entirely to securing and distributing seeds, plants, etc., of new and rare sorts. * * * This is a line of work that would result in much more value to individual districts throughout the country than the distribution of a large quantity of common varieties of garden seed, which have no particular merits, so far as newness or promise are concerned."

Those Members of Congress who still hang on to "free seeds" are defending their position by asserting that "the farmers want them." This position appears untenable, from the fact that the National Grange, at its last annual convention, at Portland, Oreg., vigorously condemned the free-seed appropriation, as have the State granges of Illinois, New York, and other States.

[The Breeder's Gazette, Chicago, March 21, 1906.]

HELP KILL FREE SEEDS.

It is intimated that a fight will be made in the House to reincorporate the appropriation for free seed distribution, which was eliminated by the committee in preparing its budget for the Department of Agriculture. It is not to be supposed that this hoary-headed petty graft would die easy, but it should die hard—good and hard and dead. Farmers can kill it. If only half of this journal's readers would write letters to their representatives requesting that they vote against an attempt to appropriate the people's money for such private ends, any amendment that shows itself in the House would be quickly killed. What kind of a letter should be sent? Here is one which the writer of this editorial has forwarded to his Congressman:

"I acknowledge receipt of several packets of garden seeds, sent me with your compliments under your frank.

"If the Department of Agriculture would like me to devote any part of my farm or garden to testing any new variety of plants I would be pleased to comply, but there is no more reason why the Government should supply me with common garden seeds than with bread and meat.

"Kindly accept this as a request that you do all in your power to secure the abolition of the free distribution of common seeds. I am sure that such an act would meet with the approval of the farmers of your district, who do not desire to be considered pensioners on the Government, even to so slight an extent."

Try a letter something like that. Let your Congressman know that he can not get your vote or hold it by sending you a dime's worth of garden seeds. Help Congress to lop off this scandalous misappropriation of money. Let the distribution of seeds be confined to rare varieties which the Secretary of Agriculture desires tested under different conditions in this country. That was the object of the original appropriation for this purpose, but it has been sadly perverted into a perquisite by the use of which a Member is supposed to curry favor with his constituents. Let us have an end to it. Members of the House Committee on Agriculture who have recommended the abolition of this appropriation would be pleased to have the farmers of the country support them in the move.

[The Breeder's Gazette, Chicago, March 7, 1906.]

The free-seed joke got a jolt in the House Committee on Agriculture the other day. Several Secretaries of Agriculture have recommended the abolition of the free-seed distribution by Congressmen, but in spite of this it has long been maintained as one of the most precious perquisites of the national legislators. The privilege of sending a half dozen packets of flower or garden seeds, worth about 25 cents at the store, to a number of their leading constituents has been thought of such inestimable value to the political "fences" of Congressmen that they declined to give it up, even though it cost the Government about $250,000 a year to carry on this petty free-gift affair. How precious this privilege seems in the sight of legislators is revealed in the fact that the abolition of this appropriation for free seeds was carried in the committee by the close vote of 8 to 7. No more singular phase of public life has been forced on the view of the public than this long-retained grasp on public money for the attempted furtherance of personal ends. The distribution of seeds by Congressmen has long since become one of the jokes of political life, and is now as stale as a jest of the Adamic age. Conceived in a spirit of utility, designed to introduce rare seeds that might be profitably included in the economy of our field and garden production, this free-seed distribution long ago degenerated into one of the most petty of all known devices to curry political favor. It is greatly to be hoped that the Senate committee will concur with the House committee in eliminating this worse than waste of public money, and it is further hoped that no member of either House will have the hardihood to endeavor to reincorporate the appropriation by an amendment when the bill is up for action. Under the bill as drafted the only seeds which the Department can purchase are rare seeds for experimentation at the different State stations.

[Evening Wisconsin, Milwaukee, Wis., March 23, 1906.]

CUT OFF THE FREE-SEED WASTE.

The House of Representatives should not reverse the action of its Committee on Agriculture, which struck from the appropriation bill the traditional provision for the free distribution of seeds. The last appropriation bill carried an allowance of $290,000 for that purpose, an amount of money that is enormous in comparison with any benefits that can possibly be conferred upon the people by the distribution of seeds of the character of those which constitute the free output through the mails.

If the flower and vegetable seeds received by the nonagricultural taxpayer are a fair sample of the seeds which are sent to agriculturists, it is difficult to find any value whatever in the distribution, as they are all flowers of the commonest varieties, and vegetables and grains which are generally grown. There is excuse for a distribution of something absolutely new, as macaroni wheat, for instance, was several years ago; but there is absolutely no reason why the Government should annually provide free seeds for farmers and gardeners, who can with a little care gather their supplies from their own premises or purchase new varieties in the village stores.

The free distribution of seeds imposes a burden upon the United States mails, as the packages are all franked by the Congressmen who send them out, and consequently carried without postage. It is estimated that if the Department of Agriculture were required to pay postage at the usual rate on the seeds which are now sent free, the revenues of the Post-Office Department would be increased over $500,000. This would be a considerable item of income for a Department that calls for a large deficiency appropriation from every Congress.

If penny letter postage is desired, it can be achieved only by the establishment of economies through a reduction of the cost of carrying the mails. All illegal mail matter must be weeded out, and all burdens, such as that imposed by the free distribution of seeds, must be removed. There should be a strong popular protest against any attempt on the floor of the House to replace in the appropriation bill the provisions for the free distribution of seeds which has been wisely stricken out by the Committee on Agriculture. Dwellers in the city do not expect seeds from the Government, and the farmers are not asking for them. On the contrary, the National Grange, representing 800,000 farmers, adopted resolutions at its convention in Portland, Oreg., last year, strongly denouncing the appropriation for free seeds as a reckless waste of money, as the policy of free distribution is of no practical value.

On the 1st of April the Postmaster-General proposes to refuse to admit a large amount of matter that is now received as second-class and carried at 1 cent a pound, which costs the Government 5 cents a pound to carry. With this economic course as to all matter now practically deadheaded the business and industrial interests may look for penny postage in the near future.

FREE SEEDS.

The free distribution of seeds by the Government of the United States ought to be abandoned. It is not only a nuisance to the Senators and Representatives, unsatisfactory to the farmers, and expensive to the people, but it is an unjust competition on the part of the Government against the seedsmen and nurserymen of the country.

The total distribution during the year ending June 30, 1905, was as follows:

Miscellaneous vegetable, packets	32,067,335
Miscellaneous flower, packets	3,706,065
Tobacco, packets	114,190
Cotton, 1-peck packages	8,665
Cotton, ½-peck packages	2,880
Lawn grass, packages	18,000
Miscellaneous, packages	60,000
Total packets and packages	35,977,135

The numbers of vines, plants, and bulbs distributed were:

Grapevines	24,675
Strawberry plants	97,000
Bulbs, gladiolus	134,000
Bulbs, tuberose	98,400

These figures will indicate the extent of the Government competition with the regular dealers in seeds. The total appropriation for this work was $290,000, and the expensive character of the work appears from the fact that no less than $71,000 of the whole appropriation was expended on salaries, nearly $42,000 in assembling and mailing the seeds, and less than $91,000 in the purchase of seeds themselves. This looks like a waste of public funds, especially as the bulk of the seeds distributed are old varieties of little value to the recipients. Congressman Cocks, of New York, is to offer an amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill eliminating the appropriation for free seeds, and says not only that many Congressmen have assured him of their support, but that he has received many letters from farmers advocating the reform.

[Farm and Fireside, Springfield, Ohio, April 1, 1906.]

CONGRESSIONAL SEED DISTRIBUTION.

The world truly moves. Progress may be slow, but it is also sure. The recent action of the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, when it decided by a close vote to strike out the $250,000 appropriation for seeds, came to some of us as a most agreeable surprise. It is, however, only the first step toward the eradication of the arrant old humbug, and the real fight about it in the two Houses is yet to come. In these days of immense graft and waste, the question, financially, is of comparatively little importance. But it has always galled me to see this petty and absurd distribution of Government pap be made in the name of agriculture, and for the alleged benefit of the American farmer. The end of it is bound to come.

[Twentieth Century Farmer, Omaha, Nebr., March 28, 1906.]

THE FREE-SEED DISTRIBUTION.

The annual farce of Government seed distribution is now due. This old Congressional custom, which has long since outlived its usefulness as an agricultural adjunct, should be discontinued as a useless expense of public funds, a silly recognition of political friendships, an abuse of confidence with the people in encouraging them to plant seeds that have no guarantee of quality or trueness to name, a system of distribution which recognizes no fixed conditions in soil or climatic adaptation for successful plant growth. A system which at the present time has no redeeming quality or excuse for its existence, except as a graft to squander about $300,000 annually of the funds of the United States Treasury, encourage a seed graft in the supply of this stock, and work an imposition upon the legitimate seed industry of the country.

There is a large field open for Congressional experimental aids to agriculture in the introduction and tests of grains, grasses, and plants of other countries that would meet the indorsement of our progressive people and be of ultimate advantage to our country. Why not discontinue the useless expense of Government seed distribution and aid in a worthy cause that all our people can indorse and appreciate as commendable and profitable?

[The Michigan Farmer, Detroit, Mich., March 17, 1906.]

THE QUESTION OF FREE-SEED DISTRIBUTION.

The committee having under consideration the appropriation bill for the National Department of Agriculture have stricken from it the free-seed distribution clause. This does not necessarily mean that there will be no appropriation made for the purpose of free-seed distribution, as the clause may be reinstated on the floor of the House when the bill comes up for passage, as was the case last year, after having been eliminated by the committee. It is said that prominent seed dealers of the country have been in conference in Washington for the purpose of using their influence to prevent a similar action this year. While the final outcome of the matter is pending, let us analyze the situation carefully from the standpoint of the farmer who would get the seeds in case the distribution is continued. First let us look into the matter of the cost to the Government. Figures in the report of Prof. B. T. Galloway, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, for 1905 show that the Government paid $245,000 for the handling of $90,000 worth of seeds. The items of salaries, traveling expenses, assembling and mailing, and miscellaneous amount to $2.70 for every $1 in actual value of seeds distributed. Thus it will be seen that the expense incurred by the Government in collecting a few cents' worth of seeds to each person receiving them is nearly three times the first cost of the seeds. What recipient of the bounty (?) of the Government will desire a continuation of seed distribution as at present conducted in the light of this fact?

Any fair-minded man should concur in the opinion that this is not good business. It is not what was intended when the foundation of the present system of free-seed distribution was laid, for this is not a new question. It is older than the Department of Agriculture. Free-seed distribution by the Government had its origin as far back as when the agricultural interests of the country were looked after by a bureau of the Patent Office instead of by a great Department of the Government as at present. At that time a small appropriation was made to enable the Commissioner of Patents to buy and distribute to the farmers of the country "rare and valuable foreign seeds." There can be no doubt about the wisdom of this move or of the benefits which have accrued to the country along this line. It was under the provisions of this law that tea culture was first introduced into this country as a beginning, and it is to just this line of work that many of our most valuable seeds and plants have been introduced and acclimated, thus not only broadening the field of American agriculture, but fostering and building up many dependent industries as well. Nor is there any question but that this kind of work should be continued indefinitely. The money appropriated for research along this line is well expended, as past results plainly indicate, but can the same be said of that appropriated for the distribution of garden seeds? We think not. We believe with the chairman of the committee that cut the appropriation that "when it comes to peas and beans and corn and turnips the country is sufficiently well informed to go it alone without expending a quarter of a million dollars for this purpose." Not but that there is legitimate field of work for the Department along this line in experimenting with new and improved varieties of all farm staples and in distributing a reasonable amount of seeds which experiments shall determine to be of exceptional value. Indeed too much money, if wisely expended, could hardly be appropriated for this purpose, since there can be no proper comparison between the good which would result from work of this kind and the wholesale distribution of common seeds of indifferent quality as conducted at present. Nor do we believe that the Department or the Congressmen would care to perpetuate the present system if they were only assured that their constituents would approve if it were abolished. Why not give them that assurance while the matter is under consideration?

[Cincinnati Packer, April 21, 1906.]

THE FREE-SEED FRAUD—CONGRESS ANNUALLY WASTES $250,000 IN THIS MANNER—SEEDS ARE OF NO VALUE TO FARMERS, BUT CONGRESSMEN UTILIZE THEM AS A REMEMBRANCE—STARTED HARMLESSLY.

CINCINNATI, April 21, 1906.

The American Grange Bulletin recently published the following regarding the free-seed distribution agitation which is now attracting attention all over the country:

"The annual distribution of seeds through the Department of Agriculture is graft, pure and simple—not less such because it is for a political object than if it were prosecuted for private and direct money gain. Last year Congress appropriated $290,000 for this purpose, the number of packages scattered broadcast among the people being 36,293,820. It is not imagined or pretended that the seeds are of any real use or value to anybody except the Congressmen themselves, who are enabled in this way to advantage themselves by 'remembering' their favorite constituents.

"ORIGIN OF THE GRAFT.

"In the year 1869 Congress gave $1,000 to the Patent Office for the purpose of collecting and giving away 'rare and improved varieties of seeds.' This was the germ out of which the monster graft in question has grown. Year after year the appropriation for the purchase and distribution of seeds has been increased, and beyond question it will reach $400,000 per annum within half a dozen years from now. This nonsense has already cost the people not far from $5,000,000. Nine years ago the then Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Morton, declared that it was contrary to law, inasmuch as the seeds sent out were neither rare nor improved, but of the commonest kinds, such as corn, beans, nasturtium, and pansies—Congressmen having refused to receive anything but ordinary field and garden seeds.

"A RIDICULOUS COLLECTION.

"Attention was called to the fact that the average parcel of seeds consisted of five little papers, amounting in all to about two-thirds of an ounce, and consisting of two-tenths of an ounce of cabbage seed, two-tenths of an ounce of cucumber seed, three-tenths of an ounce of squash seed, three-tenths of an ounce of turnip seed, and less than one-tenth of an ounce of tomato seed. It is easy to imagine how utterly useless such a consignment would be to the average farmer. But when it was suggested that the seeds should be put up in larger packages Congressmen declined to consider the proposition, inasmuch as to do this would diminish the number of constituents 'remembered.'

"PROTESTED AGAINST SWINDLE.

"Congress was so angry at Secretary Morton on account of his protest against the swindle that he was threatened with impeachment. His objection to the violation of law, which could not be denied, was overcome by amending the act in such a way as to include seeds of all kinds. How little good was accomplished by the rebellion of the Department is shown by the fact that the appropriation was $80,000 for that year, 1896, and since has been increased to $290,000 per annum, and that the number of packages distributed has grown during the same period from 10,125,000 to 36,293,820. Verily, we are a long-suffering people.

"OF REAL VALUE.

"By a great effort the present Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson, has succeeded in having about $50,000 out of the huge annual appropriation set aside for the procurement of seeds and plants that are really valuable, and to this extent the original intention of the law is carried out. Also, he has in many instances persuaded Representatives from urban districts to accept flower seeds instead of garden and field seeds, in order that their constituents may utilize them in window boxes and yards.

"OTHER PEOPLE'S MONEY.

"Hitherto such urban Members, having no use for field and garden seeds, have felt compelled to exchange them with rural Congressmen for documents that they wanted, or else, as often happened, to resort to the illegal expedient of selling their quotas in bulk to agricultural Members. Brokers, by the way, have made quite a profitable business of buying up quotas of seeds for a fraction of their original cost to the Government, and not very long ago one of these dealers, who had a cellar stored full of them, offered for sale 30,000 packages of the previous year's output which had been somewhat damaged by mice.

"It is a case of other people's money. The Government is rich, so what is the use of economizing?

"FARMERS AWAKENING TO FRAUD.

"The farmers of the country seem to be awakening at last to the fact that the Government seed distribution is a delusion and a snare. Year after year Congress appropriates about a quarter of a million dollars for the 'purchase and distribution of valuable seeds,' and each Senator and Member has assigned to him 12,500 packages, each containing five packets of seeds of the commonest possible varieties. There are usually packets of radishes, lettuce, cucumber, watermelons, and carrots, or some similar vegetable. The intrinsic value of the collection is from 2 to 3 cents in each case, and no possible good is served.

"LACK MORAL COURAGE.

"Yet every attempt to cut off the distribution is fought vigorously on the floor of the House. Not one Member in ten really believes that the distribution should continue, but not one in twenty seems to have the courage to vote against the item.

"STATE GRANGE OPPOSED.

"Now, however, the State granges are beginning to take part in the fight, and already New York and Illinois have declared against the continuance of the practice.

"The Illinois State Grange, at its annual session in December, adopted the following resolution:

"'Resolved, As practical and independent farmers, that we call upon Congress to abolish its petty, annoying, and needless practice of broadcasting free and common garden seeds all over the rural districts, and we ask that the control of seed distribution be placed under the Department of Agriculture and limited to experimental work.'

"TWO AGAINST FRAUD.

"Thus far two members of the House Committee on Agriculture, Messrs. WADSWORTH and COCKS, of New York, are the only ones who have declared against the continuance of the annual squandering of money for seeds which do no good. As a rule, Members use their packages for electioneering purposes, and of course a majority will vote against the proposition to cut off the supply. If, however, the State granges generally follow the lead of Illinois and New York, it will not be many years before the seed division of the Department of Agriculture is restored to its original purpose—the discovery and distribution of new and valuable seeds—instead of continuing the purchase of the cheapest varieties in order to secure for Members of Congress as many packets as possible, without reference to utility or value."

J. M. LUPTON, WHOLESALE SEED GROWER,
Mattituck, Long Island, N. Y., March 16, 1906.

Hon. W. W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have at hand your favor of the 7th. The Committee on Agriculture in your House in reporting against any appropriation for the free distribution of garden seeds has acted most wisely and sensibly upon a proposition which is wrong both in theory and practice. It has done an immense amount of harm to one of the most scientific branches of agriculture, that of seed growing. But very little benefit has ever been accomplished by the free distribution of ordinary seeds on the part of the Government among farmers. It is more than probable that but a very small part of the seeds so distributed has ever been planted, because of the feeling which I know prevails almost universally among farmers and growers that the character of the seed sent out by the Government has not been up to the standard of those which they could buy of the seed trade, and in very many instances the varieties were not what they wanted, so that they have generally preferred to purchase what they did want in place of planting that the Government sent them free. In some instances, perhaps, farmers have felt a little complimented that their Member should think enough of them to send them a little package of seeds, but more times I have heard the receipt of one of these packages sneeringly alluded to as a scandalous misappropriation of the Government's money. To me it seems that there was no particular reason why you should send free a lot of seeds to farmers any more than any other kind of merchandise, and certainly the distribution carried out in such great proportions as it has now assumed has had a depressing effect upon the seed trade, which has been felt throughout the country. The production of seeds is perhaps the most scientific part or branch of agriculture, and can only be successfully carried on where managed with a great deal of intelligence and a thorough understanding of the condition governing their successful production. It is scientific because it must be a successful attempt in all cases to improve varieties in order to keep up to the times, and to whatever extent it exceeds in improving varieties it is in a great degree beneficial to the farmer and agriculturists. The Department of Agriculture, which obtains its supplies and turns over the order to those who bid lowest upon it, can not assume to secure in this way the best effort of the seed grower. For your seed distribution you have secured that which the seed grower has as surplus stock and is willing to dispose of at the lowest prices. It does not represent his best effort in the way of seed improvement, but merely what he most desires to get rid of. Therefore what you distributed can not be regarded as the best in the market. The product upon which he has given the most effort is reserved for what he considers his best class of customers, those who are willing to pay for the extra effort made to improve the variety. For my part I believe it far better for a cultivator to pay double price for that article upon which the grower has expended his best thought and labor than to plant the poorer article given him when we consider the small cost of the seed compared to the real value of the product. And I think that the Government of the country has been decidedly wrong in doing that which has had a depressing effect upon an industry which, if allowed to grow and flourish, will do much toward the improvement of every cultivated variety of seeds.

Yours, truly, J. M. LUPTON.

SOUTHAMPTON, LONG ISLAND, N. Y., March 27, 1906.

WILLIAM W. COCKS, Westbury.

DEAR SIR: Might I ask you to use your influence against the free distribution of common garden seeds? Last year I believe there was appropriated $290,000. I fully concur in the appropriation of the $40,000 for the purchase and distribution of new or rare seeds and plants, but the common seeds which I have had nearly every year sent to me, in my opinion, is just a farce. At first I planted the seeds very carefully, to find that they rarely came up. Corn and beans are the only seeds that gave satisfaction, and there was not enough of them to do any good. It seems to me a waste of the public money, as more than one-half of the seeds distributed are never sown.

Then, again, the mail service is overburdened with these free seeds. Instead of deriving a revenue from them they cost the Government $300,000 per annum for franking. I have yet to hear a farmer or gardener express themselves in favor of the free seeds. All think it is a fearful waste of money.

Yours, truly, S. F. MACDONALD.

Hon. W. W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in favor of the legislation which is coming before you tending to restrict the distribution of seeds by the United States Department of Agriculture, limiting the same to new or rare seeds or plants not on sale generally in the United States. It seems to me that the present system is wasteful and produces only a small percentage of good, besides being a considerable burden upon the Post-Office Department.

Hoping that your views will accord with mine, and that you will support the reform,

Yours, very truly, GEO. C. RAND.

COTTAGE GARDENS COMPANY,
Queens, N. Y., March 28, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR COCKS: Upon my return home from a trip into Mexico I found your esteemed favor of the 7th of March awaiting my attention. I am very glad that you called my attention to the effort that is being made to abolish the free distribution of common garden seeds. While I am not a seedsman and have no interest whatever in the sale of seeds, I have decided views upon that perversion of the original scheme of distributing rare plants and seeds throughout the United States for the purpose of testing new material that might prove of economic value to our country. In years past I have been at various times the recipient of Congressional liberality in the way of various packages of free seeds, and being in the horticultural business and being thoroughly versed with the best material that was offered in the way of seeds and plants by our leading nurserymen and seedsmen, I have considered myself to some extent competent to judge of the value of the material sent out. In no instance have I ever received through Congressional liberality a single variety of seed or plants that was in any way an improvement or even as good as 90 per cent of the ordinary material offered for sale through the regular channels. In fact, in almost every instance the varieties sent were of the most common, ordinary kinds, and generally the material received was some seedsmen's stock left over from years past, and so lacking in vitality that the largest percentage of it failed to grow, and had I purchased seeds at the highest market price of the better varieties and planted them upon the same space occupied by the free seeds I would have gained largely in a financial way had I been compelled to sell the crop and pay the expense of cultivation.

Now, I understand that the object sought in distributing free seeds and plants is to place in the hands of the general horticulturalist and farmer in various parts of the country new and improved varieties for trial, and from my knowledge of what has been sent out in this way I am satisfied that the above object has been very seldom attained. As I view the distribution of free seeds at the present time, it is simply a form of Congressional graft and has absolutely no merit whatever to commend it, nor, in fact, any excuse whatever except that it enables rural Congressmen to curry the good favor of certain of their constituents by sending them a little present paid for by Uncle Sam. Just a little bid for a vote, you might call it, and a mighty cheap one at that. As I view it, the money invested in this free-seed distribution is largely thrown away, and very little intrinsic benefit accrues to the recipients of this species of Congressional alms. At the present time, when there is being unearthed so much connected with the conduct of business in this country that is shady, questionable, unlawful, and in many instances criminal, it seems to me as if Congress ought to set the example and cut out this form of extravagance, and that the money spent in this free distribution should be put to some more profitable as well as more worthy purpose. I do not know of any reason why Congress should not make an appropriation and distribute free cheeses to the poor of our large cities. It seems to me as if there is just as much excuse for distributing any commodity free as there is for distributing the free seeds that have been sent out under this act for the past ten to fifteen or twenty years.

I am glad to know that the Committee on Agriculture has reported in favor of abolishing the free distribution of common garden seeds. I believe that it is a step in the right direction, and I sincerely hope that Senatorial courtesy will be suspended when this matter comes before Congress, to the end that the subject may be thoroughly thrashed out and end up in abolishing the practice.

Hoping that my views will meet with your approbation, and assuring you that you are at liberty to use them, provided you consider them of value, I remain,

Very truly, yours, CHAS. W. WARD.

Mr. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Committee on Agriculture,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to congratulate your committee on its effort to abolish the free distribution of common garden seeds. That has long been the worst old fake perpetrated upon the American farmer. Individual and organized farmers have for years been a unit against it. The agricultural press unanimously supports your committee in its recommendations to put a stop to this hoary fraud.

I am writing this letter to each member of your committee, and trust it will be brought to the personal attention of each Member of the House. I believe it safe to say that if this question were submitted to a vote by mail of every American farmer the result would be ten to one in favor of abolishing the free distribution of common garden seeds. And this judgment is based on a most intimate knowledge of the farmers' views and needs in every nook and corner of the United States. Congress can not do a more popular act, so far as agriculture is concerned, than to abolish this scandal of "free seeds."

Yours, very truly,
HERBERT MYRICK,

ESTEEMED FRIEND: You have perhaps noticed by the papers that an effort is being made to abolish the free distribution of the common garden seeds. The Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives will recommend such action. Would be glad to have your views on the subject, and, if you are in favor of the proposition, to have you do what you can toward helping it along.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your kind favor of the 13th instant, and in reply I beg to state that I am most positively in favor of the abolishment of the free distribution of common garden seeds by the Department of Agriculture.

From every investigation I have made the consensus of opinion is that the distribution of these free seeds is of no practical value whatever.

We have never as yet in our columns taken a stand on either side of the fence, but since receiving your letter asking for our cooperation, I will publish something on this subject in our April issue.

Assuring you of our cooperation, I beg to remain,

THE RURAL NEW-YORKER,
New York, March 8, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am glad to have an opportunity to reply to your letter of March 7. We have for a long time regarded the distribution of Government seeds as one of the greatest humbugs of the age. Positively no sound argument can be advanced why this distribution should not be abolished, while on the other hand an excellent reason can be given for killing off the humbug. In the first place it interferes with an honest and legitimate trade. The seedsmen of the country have thousands if not millions of dollars invested in their business. These free seeds sent out by Congressmen as they are, directly interfere with this business of the seedsmen, because naturally the man who gets these seeds as a gift from his Congressman can see no reason why he should buy legitimate products. There is no reason on earth why this industry should be singled out by the Government for direct and injurious competition, nor is there any reason why the Government should not send a man a harrow, a plow, or send his wife an organ or a sewing machine if it is to send these garden seeds to farmers. As to the quality of the seeds, it is notorious that ridiculous mistakes have been made. For example, I send you herewith a letter from one of our readers in Texas, showing what absurd mistakes are made. I have been told that samples of new cotton have been sent to people in New England, while seeds thoroughly adapted to the northern latitude have been sent to farmers in the Gulf States.

I have received numberless letters from our readers who say the only use they have for these seeds is to feed them to their chickens, and I see no reason why Uncle Sam should furnish, at a great expense, this stuff to be used as chicken feed. The greatest fraud and humbug of all, however, is the way in which the average Congressman approaches people with this petty form of graft. I once lived in the house with another man and we had a back yard garden between us. He approached me one spring and proposed a form of cooperation. His proposition was that I should spade the garden, do all the raking, plant the seed, and do all the hoeing, while he, in his turn, was to furnish the seed at Government cost. He said he had a "pull" with our Congressman which few other people had and that the Congressman would let him have these wonderful seeds guaranteed by the Government to be better than anything else. I merely mention this to show you how ridiculous, how positively absurd, this little graft or pull becomes in the hands of a Congressman. There is, as I have stated, positively no good argument to be given in favor of a continuance of this practice. It is a wise and desirable thing from time to time to distribute new seeds or rare cuttings or plants for experiment purposes, but this petty graft should be stopped off at once and I sincerely hope that you will do all in your power to have this nuisance abolished.

Yours, very truly,
H. W. COLLINGWOOD, Editor.

PARCELS POST v. FREE SEEDS.

In talking with different people on this topic, market gardeners in particular, I have yet to hear the first sensible man indorse the free seeds and plants as generally sent out from the Agricultural Department. In conversation with two of the ablest men of the Department some time back, they both admitted the free-seed shop as a discredit to the Government, it being both a big expense to the Agricultural as well as the Post-Office Department for what little good is ever derived from it. But both these men stated that Congress would never do away with the free seeds as long as many of the Members counted largely on having these very seeds, worthless as many of them might be, assist them in their elections. If only new and rare seeds and varieties were distributed for the trial (the original purpose of the business) all would be well and good. But for stuff to be sent out still that was discarded as worthless by practical men years ago is just simply a serious reflection on the wisdom of the officials of the Agricultural Department. I frequently receive seeds, not that I request them, but they come anyway. If they are of a nature to make good chicken feed, it's not so very bad, but if otherwise, they are just thrown or given away. A few days ago, in a veritable snowstorm, with a cold north wind, our rural carrier seemed to be extra heavily loaded. Asking the cause, was told, "An overdose of free seeds and plants." When opening a parcel that was directed to myself, behold what I found: Two Lenoir and two Herbemont grapevines all the way from Washington by mail, delivered in a regular snowstorm, worth, at the most, if they were needed, 10 cents. Jerusalem, what a gracious Government! No wonder we farmers are prospering when we get such gifts. Now, the Herbemont grape is one of the oldest we have. Nurseries sell them at 5 cents apiece by the 100. The Lenoir is not worth standing room in our section of the country. I have discarded them as worthless twenty years or more ago. Now, if the Post-Office Department could carry parcels of, say, up to 10 pounds weight of such goods as the people generally require at a fair rate of postage, there would be revenue for the services, and the people would be benefited. There would be an advantage all around. And would it not be best for the country's good to have the Congressmen who have not ability or brains enough to reelect them to their positions to stay at home next time and let some abler man take the place, than to have them get themselves reelected by the means of free seeds, etc.? Now, Mr. Congressman, act sensible and do away with the free-seed humbug and give the country in place a parcels post. You will stand much better chances of reelection.

DEAR MR. COCKS: I want to congratulate you on the position you have taken in regard to Congressional appropriations for seed distribution. Money so spent is mostly a waste of funds. Money spent to prevent the serious adulterations which are now occurring with many of our seeds would be wisely applied. The adulteration of alfalfa seed with trefoil has been a serious matter to the farmers of New York during the past two years.

I trust you are prospering and enjoying your work.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 13th, we are glad our views coincide with yours, and we believe we fully expressed the views of our patrons in the matter of free distribution of seeds by the Government. It has always seemed to us to be an uncalled-for waste of money, as the seeds in most cases were of very common varieties that were obsolete or inferior. We are glad your committee is going to take the stand it is, and in our issue of March 24 we have devoted considerable space recommending that the usual appropriation for this purpose be cut out.

Hon. WM. W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We appreciate very much the work of the House Committee on Agriculture in striking out the provision for appropriating money for the free distribution of seeds, and we sincerely trust that your efforts may bear fruit.

Speaking for 50,000 farmers in the corn belt who represent a population of one-fourth of a million, I beg to state that we are strongly opposed to the Government distribution of free seed as it has been carried on in recent years. Instead of the farmer being helped by this promiscuous distribution, we believe that he is acutally being harmed. The seeds sent out are often of poor quality; they are not up to the standard of the seed sent out by our best seed houses. Furthermore, whenever a man gets something for nothing he does not value it.

So far as free-seed distribution is concerned, Congress should have nothing to do with it. Should the Department of Agriculture, in its investigations, both home and abroad, find varieties that in its opinion should receive general introduction in this country, it might for a time distribute a certain amount of such seed until their value has been demonstrated, but Congress should have nothing to do with such distribution. The free-seed distribution as practiced now is nothing but a graft and every one regards it as such.

Wishing your committee success, I remain,

Yours, very truly,
JNO THOMPSON, Editor.

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: Your letter concerning the effort that is being made to abolish free distribution of seeds at hand. In reply we wish to say that we are in hearty accord with such a movement, for we consider it a waste of funds, as it seems impossible for the Government to distribute seeds suitable to all localities. In fact, I find in my extensive acquaintance over the Northwest that the farmers consider the Government distribution of seeds no more than a farce. It is seldom that these seeds are planted, and a large per cent of them go into the farmer's swill barrel.

Thanking you for the interest you are taking in eliminating this Government graft, we are,

Very truly, yours,

THE FARMER,

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 13th instant, we mail you, under separate wrapper, marked copy of Michigan Farmer, last issue.

You will notice from same the position we have taken regarding free distribution of seeds.

Trusting you will find this along the lines desired, and assuring you that we will be glad to cooperate in any way possible to secure the desired results, we remain,

Yours, respectfully,

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 13th, would say that Farm, Stock, and Home has always been opposed to the distribution of the garden seeds by the Government, and we are glad to know there is a good prospect of the practice being discontinued. There is an absolute waste of people's money without giving them any benefit whatever.

Very truly, yours,

FARM, STOCK, AND HOME COMPANY,

Hon. WILLIAM W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Answering your favor of the 13th instant, I take pleasure in saying that Farm and Fireside for many years past has steadfastly opposed the free distribution of common garden and flower seeds. During all that time the contributors and readers, as far as known, have approved of the stand taken by the paper. Expressions of their opinion have been in favor of it; in fact, not one expressed a desire to have free-seed distribution continued.

Farm and Fireside now heartily indorses the action of the Committee on Agriculture in recommending its abolition, and respectfully urges the Members to "stand pat" on the proposition when it comes up in the House.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN C. BARNETT.

NEW YORK STATE FRUIT GROWERS' ASSOCIATION,

Hon. W. W. COCKS,

DEAR SIR: I learn that you are interested in a plan to abolish the present seed distribution, so far as it applies to common garden seeds. I wish to say that my acquaintance with the farmers of this section of the State, and with the fruit growers of the whole State, leads me to the belief that the sentiment is strongly in favor of the movement for which you stand.

Personally, for many years I have been opposed to Government seed distribution. It might be desirable to send the seeds of certain new plants into localities where the probable conditions would be favorable for them, but for the present I believe that the whole plan had best be discontinued.

Anything you do along this line, I believe, will be appreciated by the farmers and fruit growers of New York State.

Very truly, yours,

E. C. GILLETT, Secretary.

THE NEW YORK STATE POULTRY SOCIETY,

HONORABLE SIR: Myself, as well as the majority of the members of the above association, which I represent, are opposed to the distribution of common garden seeds, but do favor the distribution of seeds of new plants for trial. Trusting this will meet with your approval.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN D. JAQUINS, President.

THE NEW YORK STATE SHEEP BREEDERS' ASSOCIATION,

Hon. W. W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I want to express my approval of the determined stand you are taking in opposition to any further distribution of ordinary garden seeds which are sent out from Washington. I have never been able to see one good reason for such distribution as it has been carried on in past years. The seeds which I have received in quite large quantities are as a rule not as desirable varieties, neither are they as fresh as can ordinarily be purchased from reliable seed houses, and whatever seeds have been sent have been used only as food for poultry. I trust you will keep up this fight until the distribution is discontinued, and I am confident that such course on your behalf will merit the approval of the best farmers of the country. At the same time I am of course in favor of a reasonable distribution and experimenting with strictly new varieties of seeds, and in this way increase the number of valuable plants that may be adapted to various localities.

With congratulations for your good work in this direction, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

FRANK D. WARD, President.

NEW YORK STATE ASSOCIATION OF BEE KEEPERS' SOCIETIES,

Hon. W. W. COCKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am not interested in the sale of seeds; but as an American citizen I wish to protest against a continuance of the Congressional distribution of common and abundant varieties of garden seeds and to urge a discontinuance of the practice, believing as I do that said seeds are of doubtful utility, to say the least.

I am, however, in favor of the Government distribution of seeds of new varieties of plants, and believe that more attention should be given to the testing and distribution of such seeds.

Believing that I voice the sentiment of a large majority of those whom it is my privilege to represent, I would urge you to use your best efforts toward bringing about the desired change in this matter.

Yours, truly,

W. F. MARKS.

MY DEAR SIR: At the regular meeting of the Horticultural Society of New York, held on March 14, the subjoined resolution was presented in council and unanimously adopted. Acting under instructions from the council, I beg leave to transmit copy of said resolution to you:

"Resolved, That we view with satisfaction the probable discontinuance of the free distribution of garden seeds by the United States Government. We respectfully urge upon our Representatives in Congress, and the United States Senators from New York, that they use their best efforts to have this practice stopped. We denounce it as a useless waste of public money and a flagrant perversion of the aims and intent of the law creating the Department of Agriculture."

Yours, faithfully,

LEONARD BARRON, Secretary.

DEAR SIR: I notice by the papers that you are the originator of a bill before Congress to abolish the free distribution of common garden seeds. Personally I believe you are right. And from what I can learn in meeting the members of the State Fruit Growers' Association I believe it meets with the hearty approval of a large majority of our members. Still I think the careful distribution of the seeds of new varieties of plants and vegetables will continue to be of benefit to agriculture.

Trusting you may succeed in the passage of your bill, I am,

Truly, yours,

T. B. WILSON.

STATE OF NEW YORK DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF FARMERS' INSTITUTES,
Fayetteville, N. Y., March 22, 1906.

Hon. GEORGE L. FLANDERS,
Assistant Commissioner of Agriculture, Albany, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of March 19 asking about the matter of free-seed distribution by the National Government is received. I have attended practically all of the annual meetings of the various State agricultural organizations during the winter and have conversed with a great many of our leading farmers in relation to seed distribution. I believe I can say that, without exception, the leading members of these organizations are opposed to the distribution of the sort of seed that is being sent out—that is, common, ordinary seeds that could be procured of any seedsman. Quite a number of them, however, express themselves as being in favor of having samples of new and valuable seed for testing sent into the different sections in order that we may find out whether or not any new crops are suitable for growing in our State.

Trusting that this gives you the information you are seeking, I am,

Yours, very truly,

F. E. DAWLEY.

STATE OF NEW YORK, DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF FARMERS' INSTITUTES,
Fayetteville, N. Y., March 22, 1906.

Hon. W. W. COCKS,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COCKS: I have just received a letter from Mr. George L. Flanders at Albany in relation to Government seed distribution and inclose herewith copy of my reply.

I believe, if you wish it, I could get you a letter from the president of each of the various agricultural and horticultural organizations in New York State supporting your position in this matter. I have been in more than fifty of the counties of the State during the past winter, and from the fact that as statistical agent for the United States Government I have sent out some seed I believe I know very well the attitude of the people.

Yours, very truly, F. E. DAWLEY.

NEW YORK STATE GRANGE,
OFFICE OF THE MASTER,
Philadelphia, N. Y., April 3, 1906.

Hon. W. W. COCKS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I take this opportunity of addressing you in regard to the free-seed distribution. It seems to me that this is the proper time to cut off this needless and wasteful use of the public money. For myself, personally, and for the order of Patrons of Husbandry, numbering 70,000 members in the State of New York, I wish to enter a protest against any further distribution of common seeds by the Federal Government. So far as the distribution of new or rare varieties of seeds is concerned, I think that there is no objection to that, but the practice of sending common seed should be stopped at once.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. A. FULLER.

The increase in the country's wealth as a direct result of the plant introduction work of the Department of Agriculture.

COST TO THE GOVERNMENT.

Total cost of nine years' work of the Office of Plant Introduction	$210,000
(Which is considerably less than the appropriation of a single year for Congressional seed distribution.)
Paid for salaries, not over (No salary being over $2,500.)	50,000
Remainder expended for the purchase of new plants, for exploration expenses in foreign countries in search of new plant industries and for the propagation, dissemination, and recording of newly introduced plants	160,000
	210,000

PROFIT TO THE COUNTRY.

On durum wheat.—A new wheat from Russia has been introduced into the semiarid region of the Northwest which yields over 4 bushels more per acre than the wheat formerly grown there, is a surer crop, less subject to disease, better for macaroni making, brings practically the same price as other kinds, and which will produce a crop on land too dry to grow the ordinary American wheats. Approximately 1,330,000 acres of this wheat was grown last year, yielding 20,000,000 bushels. This represents over 5,000,000 bushels more than the ordinary wheat would have yielded.

5,000,000 bushels, at 60 cents	$3,000,000
Less difference in price of new wheat, 10 cents a bushel on 15,000,000 bushels	1,500,000
	1,500,000
Investment represented by total cost to the Government of the introduction of the wheat	30,000
Earnings for the single year 1905 (Earnings for previous years when 10,000,000 and 15,000,000 bushels were produced left out of account.)	1,500,000

On Finnish black oat.—A quick-maturing oat from Arctic Finland has been introduced into Alaska and has become the most profitable oat now grown there. The figures of actual earnings are not obtainable.

On Swedish select oat.—A Swedish oat found in Russia has been introduced into the Northwest, and in Wisconsin alone it has raised the average yield of oats per acre in that State by 6 bushels. The total area planted to this oat in Wisconsin alone in 1905 was about 200,000 acres, and the net gain, at 6 bushels per acre, from the cultivation of this imported variety yielded the farmers of that State, in the single season of 1905, $360,000; investment represented by estimated cost to the Government of the introduction, $5,000; earnings for the single year 1905, estimated at 6 bushels per acre increase on $200,000 acres, amounts to $1,200,000 bushels, at 30 cents a bushel, $360,000. (Earnings for previous years left out of account and extra price secured for seed oats not considered.)

On Japanese rice.—The Kiushu rice from Japan has been introduced into the Louisiana and Texas rice plantations, and it is now grown on half the rice-growing areas of these States. It is a more vigorous variety, yields 2 to 3 barrels more of rice to the acre, has a straw that is better for fodder, and, being short kerneled, it is not so much broken in the milling as the ordinary rice previously grown there. Its introduction has been an important factor in the phenomenal growth of the rice industry in Texas and Louisiana, the acreage devoted to this crop having increased from 210,396 acres in 1898 to 610,700 acres in 1904, and the output from 115,000,000 pounds to 650,000,000. If, as has been estimated, one-half of this increase is due to the introduction of the Kiushu rice, the annual value of the earnings from this introduction equals $3,000,000.

The loss to the planters through the breakage of the ordinary variety in the milling process was estimated as $3,000,000 a year before the introduction of this new variety, and it is fair to estimate the saving brought about by the introduction of the Kiushu rice, now grown over one-half the rice area at one-half this sum.

Investment represented by the cost of sending an explorer twice to Japan and China to select and purchase the seed	$18,000
Earnings for the single year 1905, estimated as above as savings	1,500,000
Increased crop production	3,000,000

On Turkestan alfalfa.—A more drought and alkali resistant alfalfa from Turkestan of distinctly superior quality for stock feeding has been introduced which produces in the trials that have been made in the arid West, where the yield of the ordinary alfalfa is reduced by drought to less than 2 tons per acre, from 50 to 100 per cent larger yields than the ordinary alfalfa heretofore grown there.

Although it has just been introduced, there are thousands of acres of this variety already established in the arid West and there are 60,000,000 acres of the Great Plains region on which its use will be an advantage, and several seed firms are importing this year carload lots of seed from Turkestan. Investment represented by the cost of two expeditions to Russia and Siberia and the seed secured, $6,000.

The new Bohemian horse-radish.—A variety of horse-radish has been brought in from Austria, which is fine flavored, yields a ton more to the acre, and is better appearing than the ordinary American horse-radish. It is now growing on at least 20 acres of land in New Jersey, Wisconsin, and Missouri.

Investment represented by part of the expenses of an explorer in the field while getting other plants, and the cost of the plants, their propagation and distribution	$500
Earnings for the single year 1905, 20 acres at 1 ton extra per acre, at $100 a ton, the market price	2,000

Kaffir corn introductions.—Kaffir corn was an early introduction by the Department from Africa, at a cost of not more than $5,000, and produces over $15,000,000 worth of grain and forage each year on the dry lands of the West, where corn is a very uncertain crop. All the best varieties have recently been gotten from all parts of the Old World, and comparative tests to find which are most profitable are in progress.

SUMMARY OF EARNINGS FOR THE YEAR 1905 ON WHICH FIGURES ARE OBTAINABLE.

On these few grain and forage plant introductions alone, which are quick yielders and where the profits can be estimated, the earnings to the country for 1905 have been (not counting rice increased production nor Kaffir corn) $3,362,600.

But these are only a few of the 18,000 new introductions which have been made since 1897, many of which are as promising wealth producers as those cited.

The condition of some of these other Government investments which are not yet yielding dividends to the country of such a nature as to admit of being represented in figures is as follows:

Date introductions.—The fact has been proved that America can grow her own dates. She now imports $600,000 worth every year. Over 3,000 date palms of 170 varieties have been introduced and are now growing in gardens in Arizona and California. These have been secured in Arabia, Algeria, Egypt, and Beluchistan, and a number have produced excellent fruit.

There are at least 500,000 acres where the date palm will probably be commercially grown in America, and fresh, clean dates produced. It is a plant which will grow on alkaline soils where most plants do not succeed, and will make farms and homes possible in regions which to-day are largely uninhabited. Investment represented by cost of expedition to the Sahara, Egypt, Arabia, and Tunis, and the cost of the high-priced young palms, and freight, $30,000.

New vegetable introduction.—The favorite vegetable of the Japanese (the Udo) has been introduced, and hundreds of patches of it are growing all over the country.

It has proven easier of cultivation and a heavier yielder than celery or asparagus, and its characteristic flavor has won enthusiastic admirers wherever it has been tasted. It is a distinct and valuable addition to the food plants of the country, and is a gift from Mr. Barbour Lathrop, of Chicago, that the Government has spent not over $3,000 to disseminate.

Japanese matting-rush introduction.—The rush of which the Japanese make their matting, which we pay $5,000,000 a year for, has been introduced and is growing in the abandoned rice plantations of the Carolinas. There are thousands of unused acres in the South where it will grow, and there is a market for the raw rushes of $2,000,000 in New England, where machines have been invented for weaving the matting.

These investigations have been two years in progress, at a cost of not over $2,000, and promise to be successful.

Developing sugar-beet seed growing.—The sugar-beet seed industry is an important one and one which is bound to increase as time goes on. At present this country is dependent almost wholly upon foreign-grown seed, and this Department has been working with considerable success to develop a home-grown supply. We are importing a half million dollars' worth of seed annually, and, besides this, a very conservative estimate shows that by proper seed growing, if we can increase the yield of beets and the percentage of sugar to even a very small degree, it will mean an increase of a million dollars annually in the value of the sugar production in this country. Our experimenters have already demonstrated that American seed properly grown will give an increase of at least 1 ton per acre in the yield, which will be equal to something like 300 pounds of sugar per acre.

Wilt-resistant cottons.—The annual loss in the southeastern cotton-growing section alone from wilt disease is upward of half a million dollars. The Department experts who have been studying this disease for years have developed several strains of wilt-resistant cotton. These are just ready for wide distribution. The same is true of cowpeas and watermelons in the South. Both of these crops suffer more or less from disease, against which the Department experts have developed immune strains. In the case of watermelons we are now growing stock of the first immune variety ever produced.

Cover crops.—The tobacco growers of Connecticut alone would realize a saving of $300,000 annually if a proper leguminous cover crop could be found. Our experimenters in the last two years have shown that this can be done, but much more work needs to be done before the proper varieties can be thoroughly made available for the purpose. The matter of cover crops for orchards in the great fruit-growing sections of Michigan, Florida, and California is in the same condition.

Tobacco seed of selected types.—The growers of high-priced tobacco in both Connecticut and Florida have suffered much in the past from the lack of uniformity in type. At times not more than a very small percentage of the crop could be sold on account of this lack of uniformity. During the current fiscal year we have made our first distribution of selected tobacco seed, and this important branch of the work has only just commenced.

Oats.—In the South a rust-resistant oat is very desirable. An oat of this type was introduced by the Department a great many years ago, but the variety has greatly deteriorated, and we have just taken up again the problem of pushing a thoroughly good rust-resistant oat. Some money has already been expended on this, and when it is borne in mind that the introduction of the Swedish Select oats has increased the oat crop in Wisconsin alone by $1,000,000 annually the importance of the introduction of some of the new varieties which the Department now has under way can readily be appreciated. One of our experimenters has been working for a number of years on the problem of developing a better quality of oat and one of heavier yield for the Middle States. We have small stocks of these varieties on hand now, and should by all means have an opportunity to increase the stocks and distribute the desirable sorts.

Hardy oranges.—During the past few years the Department has expended several thousand dollars in breeding and distributing selected oranges that can be grown farther north and be relatively free from danger during the disastrous freezes which visit Florida. Some of these varieties have been distributed during the past three years, but varieties of still greater promise are now on hand in small quantities.

Flaxseed and flax fiber.—The flaxseed crop of North Dakota is worth nearly twenty millions of dollars annually, and as good flax can be produced in this country as anywhere. Two years ago the Department sent an expert to Europe to secure the best varieties of flaxseed, and these, together with some disease-resistant varieties developed in this country, should by all means be distributed throughout the West. It is difficult to calculate the amount of money represented by such sorts, but there is no reason why the crop of flaxseed in this country should not be doubled by such an introduction.

Timothy.—For several years past we have been breeding new varieties of timothy, which, as you know, is a standard grass over the larger part of the United States. Some of these new varieties gave a yield of from 15 to 25 per cent higher than the ordinary crop. An increase of 20 per cent in this crop, even without an increase in acreage, will amount to an annual increase of $10,000,000 in the value of this crop alone.

Soy beans.—Soy beans have become an important crop in some sections of the country, especially Kansas, and we have a new variety which is about ready for distribution, and gives a larger yield, while it is eaten much more freely and is easier to harvest. The introduction of this variety would also be rendered impossible if the funds were lacking.

Alfalfa.—There are approximately 60,000,000 acres of the Great Plains region alone where our new Turkestan alfalfa has proven decidedly superior to the ordinary kind, and its extension into this region will make farming there much more profitable. In that region the Turkestan alfalfa will produce from 50 to 100 per cent greater yield than the ordinary kind, often succeeding moderately where the ordinary kind fails entirely. While this variety may be considered as already introduced, there is still much work to be done in extending it throughout the region to which it is adapted. These semiarid sections are at present enjoying a series of rather wet years, and it is highly important that this seed be pushed into these regions rapidly during the next few years so that the alfalfa may get a good start before another season of dry years occurs. Besides the Turkestan alfalfa we have under way a new variety from Arabia, which is adapted to something like 500,000 or 1,000,000 acres in the irrigated regions of the South. In these sections it produces a ton of hay per acre more than the ordinary kind. The value of this hay, uncut, is at least $2 per ton, making an annual increase in value of from one to two million dollars if we can get this variety thoroughly introduced.

Grapevines.—The grape industry in California for some time has been suffering severely and has been threatened with almost total extinction on account of disease. We have now established nine experimental gardens, where we are trying to introduce disease-resistant varieties which are at the same time adapted as stocks for the fine table and wine crops. The successful completion of this work will be worth millions of dollars to California.

Brewing barleys.—The brewers of the country are awakening to the fact that a more satisfactory brew can be made from a pure barley than from a mixed lot. The introduction of these pure races has been put under way by the Department, and the time is ripe just now for their rapid extension. The crop will bring a higher price to the farmers and means a saving also to the brewers.

Mango introductions.—One of the best fruits of the Tropics is the mango, and the largest collection of varieties in the world has been assembled from India, Ceylon, East Africa, and the South Sea Islands, for the purpose of establishing the mango industry in Florida, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

Some of these varieties will fruit next season, and they will prove a new paying fruit crop for these regions and add a new fruit to the American menu.

The cost of these introductions will not exceed $10,000.

The pistache introduction.—The pistache is a tree that withstands drought in a remarkable degree and produces one of the most delicious table nuts known, as well as a flavoring extract which is now imported. Plants of this most promising new crop for the arid regions have been placed in the hands of experimenters. Hardy and cold-resistant stocks have been imported from the desert regions of Asia and China upon which to graft it, and in a few years the nuts will be as common with us as they are in Greece and Sicily to-day. There are thousands of acres of almond orchards in California and Arizona which have not been profitable because they were planted on too dry land, but this pistache will, it is believed, grow and produce good crops in these soils.

Explorations in China.—Minister Rockhill, Dr. Augustine Henry, and Professor Sargent, of Harvard, all authorities on China, agree that it has more plants likely to be valuable for American farmers and fruit growers than any other region in the world.

A trained explorer has been since July exploring the plant possibilities of this vast country, and has already sent in over a hundred more or less promising things which will be adapted to the conditions of the Middle States.

Seedless persimmons, hardy peaches and pears, remarkable new grapes, a new drought-resistant lawn plant, plums and apricots, hardy bamboos, and many important grains and vegetables are among the plants above mentioned.

When it is realized that the introduction of a Chinese peach variety revolutionized peach growing in the Atlantic States, and the Chinese pear hybrids have driven out most other sorts over wide areas of this country, the greatness of the possibilities of these new Chinese plant immigrants is evident.

Investment in this one-man expedition to China ($1,000 for his salary), $6,000.

Without going further into the same detail, as was done in describing the foregoing few selected problems, the following may be mentioned as partial investments made already, which must be followed up to produce returns, but which will have to be dropped if an appropriation of less than $110,000 is made:

The introduction of the sisal industry into Porto Rico, an industry out of which Mexico gets $16,000,000 a year from America; the introduction from North Russia and Finland of hardy fruits for the Dakotas; the establishment of clumps of the hardy timber bamboo throughout the South; the trial of the Japanese plant, from which the superlative papers of Japan are made; the introduction into the American tropics of such delicious East Indian fruits as the mangosteen, the doekos, and the leitchee, and the growing of a hop in America which shall be as good as the best European, which now brings double the price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman was to strike out the last word, and I move that all debate on that amendment be now closed.

Mr. CANDLER. I hope the gentleman from New York will not do that.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WADSWORTH. After we have read two or three lines more we shall come to the paragraph relating to bureau and plant industry. Then all this free-seed discussion will be in order. I ask the committee to wait until we get to that point.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman a question about this appropriation at this particular time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There will be no attempt to curtail debate except by unanimous consent. I ask that the reading of the bill be proceeded with until we reach the proper point.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman a question before we arrive at that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is out of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman from New York why he declines to put in any money to give unadulterated seed to the farmer when he puts in money here to give them unadulterated articles of other kinds?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, what is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Nothing; and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For experiments in animal breeding and feeding in cooperation with State agricultural stations, $25,000.

Total, Bureau of Animal Industry, $1,682,980.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee why he has put money in this bill to inspect butter and does not put money in to inspect the seed which the farmers get? That is an honest inquiry and a fair question. The Secretary of Agriculture examines the seed he raises and those he buys and distributes. That is shown by the hearings, and I challenge the gentleman from New York to read it or deny my contention. Mr. CANDLER asked this question of Doctor Galloway: "All of them (the seed) are tested?" And the answer of Doctor Galloway was, "All of them are tested." Now, the gentleman leaves out the money appropriated for that purpose, but he puts money in this bill to test our dairy products, to test the rotten beef, to test the "foot disease" and the "mouth disease," the hollow-horn disease, and the hollow-tail troubles. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to strike out the last word. [Laughter.] I do not intend to occupy but a very few moments of the time of the committee. I have not the good fortune to have had instruction either from the newspapers, from the granges, or from my constituents in relation to this subject-matter, as other gentlemen have. There seems to be a great deal of criticism, excitement, and talk about this small appropriation or proposed amendment to give some farmers a few garden seeds—a sort of a tempest in a teapot. A wondrous streak of economy and saving has taken possession of some gentlemen in reference to this matter, but I think that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD] struck the keynote, disclosed the real power behind this spasmodic economy. I believe if you could trace this opposition to its real source, though many gentlemen may not realize it—I mean the refusal to include in the bill the small sum that should be, and heretofore has been, appropriated for the benefit of the farmer who works with his own hoe and plows with his own hands, not the kid-gloved gentlemen who farm by the honest sweat of the other fellow's brow—you would find that it originates and all springs from the persons engaged and having a large amount of money employed in raising and selling seeds for the market. I have heard it called the "seed trust"—whether a trust or not I can not say. I refer to the men who are holding or about to hold, as I am informed, a convention at the New Willard to see to it that no appropriation for seeds is made.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I can not yield now; I have only got five minutes. I will yield after that. I do not know, Mr. Chairman—and he did not inform us during the considerable time he was allowed to proceed—from what source the gentleman from New York got his list of newspapers to write to; I do not know who furnished the list to him, or what was the inducement that caused him to expend so much time and labor, nor the sort of letter that he wrote. It seems, however, that he got the answers he was hunting for. But I learned quite early in life that if you wanted to get certain information and sent persons after it they generally got what you wanted; and if you wrote for information you got what you wanted if you were careful enough in the selection of your correspondents. I believe myself, notwithstanding I have had no instruction and no correspondence with newspapers, that the majority of the small farmers throughout the country, the men who receive but very little consideration from the Government [applause], are glad to have these seeds sent to them. I represent an agricultural district, a district that has more agriculture, as you may know, Mr. Chairman, than most of the gentlemen here in this House believe. I represent a county in which the farmers themselves this year will receive some $6,000,000 for what they spare in agriculture. We have large seed-raising establishments and none of their advertisements in our newspapers. Hence there are no replies hailing from my district to the gentleman from New York.

I have never had a letter from one man in any part of my district stating that he did not want the few packages of seeds sent, and I have at various times received letters of thanks for the seeds, and very many requests for them. I will admit that I think greater care ought to be taken by the Department in the seeds sent to the various climates. For instance, they do send to northern Maine seeds unfit for that climate, and if they send out rotten seeds, as has been stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS], then the Department should exercise greater care in that respect, for the law and the appropriation and every consideration demand that the seeds should be of the best quality.

Now, what is this? Here is a small sum appropriated for the purpose of sending to the farmers throughout the country packages of seeds. They have been accustomed to receive them. By receiving these packages they fail to buy of the agents of these various large concerns, who, I dare say, advertise in every paper from which the gentleman has letters, and to pay them their very remunerative profits, as they get them from the Government. I believe that the farmer, and especially the small farmer, in the out-of-the-way little town and plantation is as deserving of consideration as any class of men in our country, and until I hear from this class I shall vote to continue to send him a little memento from the Government in the shape of a few packages of seed, as we have been doing in years past. Possibly these seed producers, if they sell to the Government, are compelled to sell for a lower price than they could wring from the farmer. Under these circumstances, this distribution having been a custom for years past, it seems to me that it would be poor legislation, uncalled-for retrenchment; that it would be a saving at the spigot and pouring out at the bung to attempt to take from the farmers of this country this small amount which is used for the seed distribution, and which, in my judgment, produces great good in many cases.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to object now, but I shall not object if the gentleman will wait until we reach the Bureau of Plant Industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the question, and the gentleman failed to object. The Chair will hold that the gentleman's objection comes too late.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection at the proper time.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Chairman, at a certain point in this bill, which will be reached in a very few minutes, an amendment will be offered to restore the free distribution of garden seeds, a practice which has been in vogue for many years, to the great advantage and improvement of the agricultural interests of the country. That amendment was stricken out by the Agriculture Committee, composed of six Democrats and twelve Republicans. I understand the programme is that a point of order is to be made against that amendment, and if the Chair sustains the point of order then we will have an indirect vote on this proposition by the way of an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and if the Republicans are whipped into line, as they usually are on an appeal from a Republican Chairman, whether he be right or wrong, then the free-seed distribution will be wiped out; but I want the country to know, then, that the responsibility devolves upon the Agricultural Committee for striking this meritorious provision out, and I want the country to know that the six Democratic members on the Agricultural Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, stood, as Democrats always stand, for the interest of the farmer—the free distribution of garden seeds. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If it goes out, I want the country to know that the responsibility is on the Republican party in this House. The Democratic party has been the friend of the farmer from the foundation of the Government to this good hour. It was truthfully said by the late Senator Vest, of Missouri:

> The founder of the Democratic party was the best friend the agricultural interest ever had upon this continent. It is a singular fact that Mr. Jefferson, when minister to France, and watching the great drama of the French revolution, as he looked upon the French court at Versailles feasting and dancing, as some people are doing now, while the mob surged and roared like a wild beast in the streets of Paris, and while corresponding with the savants of Europe, sent home seeds and plants of all kinds in order to improve the agriculture of this country.
> It is a singular fact that he traveled incognito over all the southern parts of France and across the Alps into Italy in order to find out why the planters of South Carolina did not have seed rice equal to that which was produced in Europe. In Italy he found the rice superior to any that had ever been known on this continent. He discovered that by Italian laws it could not be exported, and I am not ashamed to say that in the interests of agriculture the founder of our party turned smuggler and filled his pockets inside and out with the rice, which he brought to Paris and shipped to Charleston, S. C., in small packages. It was carefully distributed and attended, and gave us the South Carolina rice, which to-day is the finest in the world.
> When William C. Rives was minister to France, in 1853, he states that in the rooms of the Royal Agricultural Society of the Seine he saw the prize plow of Thomas Jefferson, which had received a medal from that society while he was minister to France. The Democratic party has always been peculiarly devoted to the farming interests of this country, and has derived its largest support from that source. It has never been the party of the capitalist and the rich man, but has always depended upon the people on whom at last the prosperity of the country must rest.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to take up some of the reasons why the opponents of Government distribution of seed want to strike this provision out. It is said that the seed dealers are opposed to it, and I say they are behind and instigating all these newspaper articles opposing this measure, and I am going to make the broad assertion that some of the greatest commercial thieves and scoundrels in this country are among the seed dealers, and I will prove the truth of my assertion. [Applause.]

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Yes.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman yield long enough to allow me to disabuse his mind of the fact that the seed dealers are the only people in this country who are opposed to this?

Mr. TRIMBLE. No; I do not yield for that purpose, as it is immaterial who is opposed to it in discussing the merits of the measure.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have got a lot of information from the farmers here.

Mr. MANN. He has got about a couple of dozen letters here.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I want to reiterate that some of the greatest thieves who are robbing the farmers in this land are among the wholesale seed dealers of this country, and I want to prove it to this House by Government reports that can not be questioned. At the last session of Congress I introduced a bill to prevent the adulteration and misbranding of blue-grass, orchard-grass, clover, and alfalfa seed, because of the fact that many wholesale dealers were engaged in this adulteration business on a colossal scale, entailing a loss of millions of dollars to the farmers and enormous profits for themselves.

The bill provided heavy penalties for the adulterating and misbranding of these important seeds—fine and imprisonment. It met the approbation of the Secretary of Agriculture and was favorably reported to the House by the Agricultural Committee, but on account of the lateness of the session it looked impossible to have it considered; therefore, at my suggestion, the Agricultural Committee very wisely incorporated in the agricultural appropriation bill the following provision:

> The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to obtain in the open market samples of seeds of grass, clover, or alfalfa, test the same, and if any such seeds are found to be adulterated or misbranded, or any seeds of Canada bluegrass (Poa compressa) are obtained under any other name than Canada bluegrass or Poa compressa, to publish the results of the tests, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale.

Now, under the operation of this provision, mind you, after the seed dealers of the country knew that this law was on the statute books, they were caught by the wholesale, engaged in the adulteration and misbranding of seed. For the edification of those who are strenuously quoting the petitions of the seed dealers of the country as a reason why the Government distribution of seed should be done away with, I submit the first report of the Secretary of Agriculture in carrying out the provisions of this law, that you may judge for yourselves whether or not all of them are honest and have the interest of the farmer at heart.

The report is as follows:

ADULTERATION OF KENTUCKY BLUEGRASS AND ORCHARD GRASS SEED.

Seeds of Kentucky bluegrass and of orchard grass have been obtained and tested in accordance with the following paragraph contained in the act of Congress making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to obtain in the open market samples of seeds of grass, clover, or alfalfa, test the same, and if any such seeds are found to be adulterated or misbranded, or any seeds of Canada bluegrass (Poa compressa) are obtained under any other name than Canada bluegrass or Poa compressa, to publish the results of the tests, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale."

In carrying out the provisions of this act 251 samples of seed of Kentucky bluegrass and 265 samples of orchard grass were obtained in the open market and examined. Of these, 41 samples of seed of Kentucky bluegrass were found to be adulterated with seed of Canada bluegrass, while 133 samples of orchard grass seed were found to be adulterated, the seeds most commonly used as adulterants being English rye-grass and meadow fescue, the value of neither being more than one-third to one-half that of orchard grass seed. That the adulteration of orchard grass is very general is evidenced by the fact that samples containing adulterants were obtained from twenty-four States.

While Canada bluegrass is imported into the United States in quantities varying from 600,000 to 700,000 pounds per annum, it is used only occasionally in this country, and it is evident that the bulk of the seed imported is sold as Kentucky bluegrass.

In accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress quoted, publication is here made of the names and addresses of the seedsmen who sold the lots found to be adulterated, together with the percentages of adulteration in each lot.

The Department takes this occasion to call attention again to its offer, repeatedly made in official publications, in circulars sent to seedsmen, and in announcements through the agricultural press, to test and report upon samples of seeds sent for that purpose by any farmer or seedsman.

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 29, 1904.

[United States Department of Agriculture, office of the Secretary.—Circular No. 14.]

ADULTERATION OF ALFALFA AND RED CLOVER SEED.

Seeds of alfalfa and red clover have been obtained and tested in accordance with the following paragraph contained in the act of Congress making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to obtain in the open market samples of seeds of grass, clover, or alfalfa, test the same, and if any such seeds are found to be adulterated or misbranded, or any seeds of Canada blue grass (Poa compressa) are obtained under any other name than Canada blue grass or Poa compressa, to publish the results of the test, together with the names of the persons by whom the seeds were offered for sale."

In carrying out the provisions of this act 1,272 seedsmen were asked by special agents of this Department for samples of red clover and alfalfa seed, as offered for sale by them. From these seedsmen 658 samples were obtained and examined. As a result the following lots were purchased in the open market and found to be adulterated. In accordance with the mandatory nature of the act quoted above, publication is here made of the names and addresses of the seedsmen who sold the lots found to be adulterated, together with the percentages of adulteration in each lot.

JAMES WILSON, Secretary of Agriculture.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 23, 1905.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I want to call to the attention of my friend from New York [Mr. COCKS] that there were more than twenty of these seed thieves "caught in the act" in his own State. [Applause and laughter.] The Government found these honest seed dealers selling the farmers pure orchard grass, blue grass, and clover seed adulterated all the way from 10 to 90 per cent. Do you think they are honest?

Mr. COCKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Yes.

Mr. COCKS. I would like to know what that has to do with free distribution of garden seed?

Mr. TRIMBLE. Oh, I am only showing the gentleman the general character of some of the seed dealers, and that because a man is a dealer in seeds it does not necessarily follow that he is an honest man, and "loses sleep" looking after the interest of the farmer.

Mr. COCKS. I am just as much in favor of the purity of seeds as the gentleman is.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Now, a word in regard to the newspapers fighting this measure. There is a newspaper published in my district that had one of those stereotyped editorials against Government distribution. I had sent the editor a bag of garden seeds, three to four hundred packages. He requested me to send him "more seed." When I saw this article I wrote to him and asked him why he wanted the Government seeds when his paper declared them to be inferior and unfit to plant. His reply was "You go on and send your garden seed; my advertising columns are open to the public, who pay for space." [Applause and laughter.] Now, as to the granges of the country being opposed to the Government distribution. Why, of course many of them do not appreciate a little thing like that. Among them are the kid-glove farmers, who can afford a cocktail before breakfast, a clean shirt and a shave every day, a plunge bath, and bed springs at night. [Applause and laughter.] The man who wants these garden seed, and who appreciates them, is the fellow who follows the plow for fourteen hours a day, for 75 cents, while these kid-glove farmers are debating ways and means to skin him out of his crops. [Applause and laughter.]

Why, talk about graft; suppose it is graft? It is the only graft in the Government in which each of our 80,000,000 people have a chance to get a piece of the "rake-off," and that is the reason some of you are kicking. [Prolonged laughter and applause.] If a few fellows got it all, some of you distinguished gentlemen who are fighting this proposition would be on the other side of the question. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I would rather vote a hundred times the amount of this appropriation to give something to the struggling farmer who is fighting life's rugged battle unaided by the Government, something to make his home comfortable and happy; I would rather put one flower in the sick room of his wife and children, than to vote a single dollar to build life-destroying guns and battle ships. [Applause.] Some of the gentlemen on the other side of the House who are strenuously opposing this appropriation from a standpoint of economy will in a few days fall over one another to vote for the $100,000,000 naval appropriation. They say that the money could be spent to a better advantage for the farmer in some other way. I deny the assertion. I believe the money spent for the distribution of seed reaches directly more people and brings greater returns than any money appropriated by Congress. If you want to economize, begin in the right place, where there is an abundance of room for economy. "Take not from him that hath nothing, even that little which he hath." Mr. Chairman, permit me to submit for the earnest consideration of this House a feasible, plausible, and practical proposition in economy and finance that is worth the consideration of this great body and which will settle this much-mooted question for a hundred years hence, and future generations will "call us blessed." Let us eliminate from the naval appropriation bill an $8,000,000 battle ship, and instead invest the money for a hundred years in 4 per cent bonds. This will produce an income of $320,000 per year—enough money to buy double our present quota of seed—and at the end of the century we would have our original capital intact, while five battle ships would have become obsolete during the time. Besides we do not need battle ships if we stay at home and attend to our own business and let other people's possessions alone, any more than an honest, peaceable, law-abiding citizen needs a burglar's jimmy and dark lantern when he starts to church. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, let us carry this proposition to its logical conclusion. It requires $1,000,000 per year to keep one of these monster ironclads going. Invest this $1,000,000 at 4 per cent, compound the interest, and add the million each year that is required to operate the battle ship to the principal, and at each twenty-year period add eight million to the principal, the amount required to renew the old ship, and at the end of the hundred years have you any conception of what a snug little sum will have accumulated for future generations, and how proud our posterity would be of the thoughtfulness of their "wise forefathers?" I have made the calculation, and it will stagger the comprehension of the ordinary mortal. It would amount to the stupendous sum of $1,612,720,000. Transform it into silver dollars and it would load a freight train, 20,000 pounds to the car, that would reach from Washington to Baltimore; lay the coins edge to edge and they would belt the world more than one and one-half times; pile them on top of each other and you will have a silver shaft 3,181 miles high. [Applause and laughter.] If my distinguished Republican friends who are guiding the destiny of this great nation, and are having fits for fear the old "hayseed" will get a crumb as it falls from Dives's table, will sand their hands and climb this shaft, perhaps from the top, up in that rarefied atmosphere, you will see working in their fields, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes to the Gulf, the men who have raised this country from the poorest of nations to the wealthiest on this great round globe. And while up there among the angels, and away from the contaminating influences of this wicked world, it is to be hoped you will forget your subservience to the trusts and monopolies, so that when you descend to mother earth again you will have some thought of the farmer, "that Atlas upon whose broad shoulders this great world rests," the man who produces this country's wealth, who pays its taxes in time of peace and fights its battles in time of war. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the independent Republican Members of this House to join the Democrats and deal liberally with the agriculturists of this country. Help us to promote the interest of the farmer, and when we promote his interest we promote our own interest, and every man's interest who, with pick and pen, brain and brawn, honestly earns his daily bread. [Great applause.]

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent upon this floor an agricultural constituency. It is probable that more than 75 per cent of the voters in my district are engaged in agricultural pursuits. I have no purpose whatever, as far as I can do so within the bounds of conscience, acting within the limits of the Constitution, to do anything else than serve their best interests. I am opposed to this appropriation, and I oppose it because I believe the intelligent agriculturists of our country are opposed to it. [Applause.] As a matter of fact, the self-reliant farmer, whether he lives in Texas or whether he lives in Maine, does not expect the Government to aid him in his business.

All he asks or wants at the hands of his Government is the enactment of just and equal laws and their prompt and impartial enforcement. He is opposed to subsidies of all kinds, whether intended for the shipping trust or the railroad corporations, and, being always consistent, of course he would not ask one, in the shape of free garden seed, for himself. He is wise enough to know that it is to his interest to oppose this vicious policy, if not upon principle, then for purely selfish reasons, for well does he understand that, when favors in the form of subsidies are to be passed out, for every penny received by him pounds would be thrust into the pockets of those whose fortunes are already swollen beyond all healthful limits, a class recently described by a very distinguished official, who always indulges in a maximum of talk and a minimum of action.

The farmer of this country under any and all circumstances has been willing to support the Government, and has never at any time expected the Government to support him. Gentlemen, what is the basis for this appropriation? Is it because the farmer wants it——

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BURLESON. If you will examine the agricultural papers published throughout this country——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I have only a few minutes, and I regret that I can not yield. If you look at the agricultural papers of our country, and presumably these papers are conducted in the interest of the farmer, you will find every one of them, without exception, unalterably opposed to free seeds, and repeatedly denouncing them editorially as a "petty species of grafting."

But gentlemen upon this floor say, "Oh, these editors can not be trusted because they are controlled by unworthy motives." Mr. Chairman, these editors of farmers' papers have devoted years and years of their lives to furthering the interest of agriculture, yet it is now claimed that they can not be trusted, that they are controlled by the sordid motive which prompts them to betray the interests of their subscribers in return for advertisement placed in their papers by seedsmen.

I do not believe it, but for argument's sake will accept that proposition as true, if gentlemen see fit to urge it; but I stand here to assert that no one can produce——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman mean to call the members of the House here grafters?

Mr. BURLESON. Not at all. I have said nothing that can be distorted into such a charge. Neither do I think that gentlemen of this House ought to stand in the cloakrooms or elsewhere and refer to "Reuben" or the "hayseed who must have his penny package of garden seed." [Applause.] I say it is as much of a reflection upon the farmer to make that statement as it would be if I had called these gentlemen grafters, but this I have not done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman allude to me? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. No, I have not the gentleman from Tennessee in mind. I am glad to say my friend from Tennessee is not within that category.

Mr. Chairman, I say that if the editors of the farmers' journals can not be trusted, and all editorials written by them on this subject are to be discredited for the reasons given, then again, I say, I challenge—now, do not all speak at once; do not arise and say "I have them, but left them in my desk or at my office," and in saying this I do not mean to impugn the statement made by the gentleman from New Hampshire—but I challenge any man here to produce a resolution adopted by a grange or a farmers' institute or a farmers' union, or any association of farmers, upholding this "petty species of graft," as the grange denominated it in resolutions recently adopted by that organization. I do not so denominate it. I only state what the farmers in their institutes have denominated it and the farmers in their unions have called it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why repeat that insulting language? I say that anybody that says I am a grafter makes a misstatement of the facts. [Great laughter.] I know my friend does not mean to be offensive, but what he says is offensive.

Mr. BURLESON. I have no quarrel with the gentleman from Tennessee. I did not have him in mind. I think I have made plain my meaning.

Mr. JAMES rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly, I am pleased so to do, at all times.

Mr. JAMES. I understood you to say that every agriculturalist in the land was opposed to this seed distribution.

Mr. BURLESON. I conscientiously believe they do not approve it.

Mr. JAMES. Now, did you make that statement conscious of the definition that "a farmer is one who farms the land and the agriculturist is one who farms the farmer?" [Great laughter.]

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, that statement is more witty than wise. This is a serious matter we are engaged in here. The question is, and it ought to appeal with great force to Democrats, whether we are going to take $200,000 and give it away without clear authorization, and that, too, to a class of people who do not ask it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, I would like a minute or two more.

A VOICE. Make it five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to be granted five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOWIE. Just one question. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that when he stated it was $200,000, that, in fact, the amount which they propose to strike out is only $90,000?

Mr. BURLESON. As I understand it, $132,000 is expended by the Agricultural Department in the purchase and preparation for their distribution of the common garden seeds, and thousands of dollars in addition are paid to the railroad companies to transport this as mail matter, as every man here knows.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend tell why he voted for the irrigation bill for Texas the other day?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly; because I thought the bill ought to be passed. I was exerting myself to have the reclamation act, already on the statute books, extended to Texas, just as it now applies to other States and Territories containing arid lands. I will further state to the gentleman that I voted for the reclamation act when it passed this body, though my mind was not free of doubt upon the question of authority to use public money for such a purpose; but my party in its platform having declared for it, I resolved all doubt in favor of the proposition, and this I always do. That was the reason I did it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the difference between sprinkling the farmer's lands with water and giving him seed?

Mr. BURLESON. I asked unanimous consent for this time, and the gentleman from Tennessee can have an abundance of time after I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want the gentleman to explain his democracy and knowledge of——

A VOICE. What about your boll-weevil appropriations?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman, I anticipated that that question would be thrust at me.

One must indeed be possessed of an illogical mind who can not differentiate between what we are asked to do here and what was sought to be accomplished by the boll-weevil appropriations.

Here we are asked to make an appropriation with a view of furnishing the farmer common garden seed, a thing he can easily secure for himself, to which I am sure he is indifferent, and which I firmly believe he does not want.

On the other hand, I did ask the Congress to make the boll weevil appropriations, the first, in 1900, for $20,000; the second, in 1901, for $30,000, and afterwards for a quarter of a million dollars. For what purpose were these appropriations requested? I challenge the record now to sustain the statement I make. Was the appropriation asked to be used in exterminating the boll weevil? Not a bit of it. It was urged by me in order that something might be done for the cotton planter which all will admit he could not do for himself. The appropriations were asked and secured with a view of enlisting the skill and knowledge of the ablest scientists, the most learned entomologists, who were, by experimentation, to discover, if possible and point a way for the destruction of this pest. Of course, the planter could not do this. He did not have the scientific knowlede to enable him to grapple with the problem.

After these scientific experts had discovered the means of destroying this insect, then the cotton planter, using his own means to accomplish that end, was to destroy it. Not one dollar was ever asked by me of this Government to be used to destroy the boll weevil. The record will bear me out in this statement. I did ask that the farmer be shown how the weevil could be destroyed, and being shown, relying only on his own exertions, he would do the rest.

I have said that a resolution adopted by a farmers' organization favoring free garden seed can not be produced.

No gentleman has arisen upon this floor to hand me one that I might send it to the Clerk's desk and have it read. It can not be produced. Furthermore, gentlemen, the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wilson——

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. BURLESON. With great pleasure.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will my colleague explain this sudden activity on the part of the grangers in opposition to this seed item?

Mr. BURLESON. It is not a sudden activity. I understand that the farmers of this country have been protesting against this unrighteous practice for years, and this is the first favorable opportunity they have had to voice their protest against it upon this floor. It seems strange to me that many here who represent agricultural constituents should now fail to give heed to their protests and earnestly insist upon the continuance of this practice.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will my colleague yield for another question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly, I will.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Have you received from a single farmer in your district, a man who tills the soil himself, one single protest against the free distribution of seed?

Mr. BURLESON. Why, no; many of them treat the matter as of so little importance that the package of seed is thrown aside and no attention paid to it. They do not know that it has cost this Government over $5,000,000 to carry on this practice. They do not know that Secretary Wilson has——

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. CANDLER. You said you had not received a single protest against this seed distribution.

Mr. BURLESON. I have answered that question.

Mr. CANDLER. Have you received numbers of requests from farmers throughout your district asking for seed?

Mr. BURLESON. Unquestionably so, but not very many. There is no denying that. And just so long as this practice is continued, I will receive these requests.

And I will add that same will always be promptly granted if the number of packages allotted me for distribution will permit. But, Mr. Chairman, the fact that these requests are made does not mean that those making them approve the practice. Knowing the system prevails; knowing that seeds have been allotted for distribution, some farmer may request a packet though he disapproves the practice and is conscious of the fact that the seed when received will be of little value. And in this connection I desire to state that if this indefensible practice is continued, and from certain signs now manifest I fear it will be, then I do say that the number should be increased so that we may send to every householder, whether he wants it or not, an assortment of seed.

Each year I have sent out the allotment I have received, and as I view it, I would be a peculator if I did not so do. I have no right to retain them or divert them for a different purpose than was intended by this Congress. Mr. Chairman, as I have tried to say several times, the present Secretary of Agriculture is a man who has devoted the best years of his life toward furthering the interests of the farmers of this country. He is a man for whom the farmers of the South have as high regard, on account of the interest he has manifested in their welfare, as any farmer found north of Mason and Dixon's line.

Secretary James Wilson—and no gentleman on this floor will question his deep interest in the welfare of the agriculturists of our country, whether of the East or West, North or South—in one of his recent reports, speaking of the distribution of these seeds, used this language:

As there is no practical object to be gained in distributing this kind of seed, it seems very desirable that some change be made. To this end it would seem wise to limit our work entirely to the securing and distributing of seeds, plants, etc., of new and rare sorts. There is still much to be done in the way of securing seeds, plants, etc., of this kind from abroad, but still more to be accomplished in careful investigations of our own possibilities in this direction. There are many valuable plants scattered all over this country which are still little known outside of their respective localities. These should be collected, tested, and distributed. There are also great possibilities of improving agricultural industries by distributing specially bred seeds and plants.

As the plant-breeding work of the Department increases opportunities for securing seed of this nature will accumulate. To do this work in the most effective manner, arrangements could be made in all cases to secure the advice and assistance of Senators and Representatives who have agricultural constituents. The Department has a well-organized force of scientists who are thoroughly familiar with the general conditions of soil and climate in nearly all parts of the country. Special crops could be selected for special purposes, and with the advice and cooperation of Members of Congress such crops could be placed where they would do the most good. This is a line of work that would result in very much more value to individual districts throughout the country than the distribution of a large quantity of common varieties of garden seed which have no particular merits so far as newness or promise are concerned.

Note his language—he speaks of "common varieties of garden seed, which have no particular merit so far as newness or promise are concerned." Thus it is this true friend of the farmer voices his protest against this useless waste, this continued useless waste, of the public money.

Mr. SIMS. You put it too strong in quoting James Wilson. He does not protest.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us ask ourselves candidly the question and each make to himself a candid answer. Is this appropriation made for no other reason or purpose than the benefit supposed to accrue to the farmer? Honor bright! Is there not entering into our action in this matter a faint hope or belief that our farmer constituent will be flattered by this small attention from his Congressman (furnished at Government expense) and will in consequence be made just a little more inclined to give us a continuance of his approval?

I may be mistaken, but I fear the purpose of some of us is to use this means to advantage ourselves by annually reminding our favorite or influential farmer constituents that we are still on the earth and have not forgotten them. Some gentlemen appear to really believe that opposition to this item would jeopardize the esteem and confidence reposed in them by their agricultural constituents—permit me to say to those who thus believe, that they underestimate the farmer of this country. I have an abiding faith in the intelligence of those I represent and I feel sure they would prefer that this money, which is now wasted in the purchase of "common varieties of garden seed which have no particular merit," as was said by Mr. Secretary Wilson, should be expended for other and more beneficial purposes.

The officials of the Agricultural Department have repeatedly urged the necessity of securing and distributing the comparatively new or little-known kinds of various field and forage crop seeds—such as corn, cotton, alfalfa, etc.—and the improvement of same by breeding and selection. Most valuable work has already been done along this line. How important it would be to the cotton planter, especially in the boll weevil section, if by selection and breeding the scientist of the Department could develop a much earlier-maturing variety of cotton. What a great saving it would result in to the cotton planter if a type of cotton could be developed which would resist the wilt or root rot. How valuable it would be to the cotton planter if by careful breeding and seed selection a long, staple upland cotton could be evolved which would command 4 or 5 cents per pound in advance of the price paid for the ordinary varieties.

If the money now virtually wasted in the purchase of common garden seed could be saved, this very important work to which I have just alluded could be enlarged and extended and benefits substantial in character brought to our farmers. Mr. Chairman, a great work has been done by the scientist of the Agricultural Department, acting under the wise guidance of Dr. B. T. Galloway, in the introduction into our country of new and valuable plants and fruits from foreign countries. No small amount of the credit for the development of the great and profitable fruit industry of both California and Florida is due the bureau over which he presides.

Plant laboratories have been established in both those States by the Government, and to them, as a result of explorations made throughout the world, valuable fruits and nuts have been brought there, tested, thoroughly acclimated, and from thence distributed throughout those States. This work is still going on and is of the highest importance to the agriculturists and horticulturists of our country.

Mr. Chairman, Texas possesses a variety of soil, suitable for every cereal, fruit, nut, vegetable, or plant that can be grown either in the Tropics or in the higher altitudes of the Temperate zone. What limitless possibilities are there presented awaiting only development by those who are skilled in the science of agronomy and horticulture? If the money now wasted on worthless garden seed could be saved, I have assurances that lead me to believe that the appropriation for carrying on this most valuable foreign exploration and introduction work would be materially enlarged and increased. New plant laboratories could then be established in other sections of our country, and other new and valuable plant, fruit, and vegetable industries there built up.

Throughout the entire South we have vast stretches of land known as canebrakes, covered by impenetrable jungles of worthless cane. Who knows that it may not be possible to substitute for this worthless cane the valuable Japanese timber bamboo, which affords not only material suitable for the construction of houses, but from it thousands of other beautiful and valuable articles may be made. Under the devastating onslaught and operations of the lumber trust, building material is growing scarcer and dearer in this country, and the time may come when those who come after us would thank us for our wisdom if we could do what is here suggested.

Mr. Chairman, many great and good things could be brought about if we would only get away from this garden-seed humbug. We all know that there is not more than 10 per cent of the membership of this body that really believe this practice should continue, but from present indications the excitement occasioned by the elimination of the item from the bill by the Agricultural Committee would indicate that there will not be more than 5 per cent who will have the courage to vote against the item being restored to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I talked with the Secretary of Agriculture no longer ago than Saturday about this matter. Two years ago he recommended that the same amount be spent in some other line of investigation, and that is all he did; and in his last report he has not a word to say in opposition to free seeds. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is too strong in his statement when he says that the Secretary of Agriculture is protesting against appropriation. He is not misrepresenting him, but misunderstood him. Now, I do not think my friend from Texas—and I am glad to so regard him—will ask that the appropriation be taken out for the destruction of the cotton-boll weevil. He has pleaded for that, and I think it was justly given, and we have appropriated $250,000 for the purpose of exterminating the boll weevil in Texas in this bill. I believe that while Texas is more interested in the matter than other parts of the country, that all parts of the cotton belt are interested, because the weevil may spread over the country, but Texas is directly and immediately interested. And now I will ask the gentleman whether he is opposed to the Agricultural Department furnishing the farmers of Texas with earlier-maturing varieties of cotton seed in order that they may head off the boll weevil.

Mr. BURLESON. This bill does not do it.

Mr. SIMS. If it does not, it should. [Laughter.] Now, then, if it is wrong to furnish the farmer that which he can furnish himself, strike out this provision for the boll weevil. The Secretary of Agriculture told me—and he will not deny it anywhere—that this was only an expression of his judgment as to the best use of the public money, and that he told the seed men at their convention in this city that they did not, at least all of them, furnish good seed, and the investigation of his Department proved it.

Now, these farmers that are opposed to this appropriation are that class of farmers who wear their watch chains across their bodies and part their chains in the middle, as they do their hair, and not that class of farmers who have got no watch chains or diamonds or free passes to go to so-called "agricultural meetings," but the farmers who need, want, and are grateful for this little bit of public favor. The newspapers that last year received $27,000,000 in graft by way of second-class postage rates are fine teachers of morality to be quoted here as lecturers of Congress on such a subject as this. I have as good people in my district, Republicans and Democrats, white and black, male and female, as are to be found anywhere in the South or in the North, and they all want these seeds, all are glad to get them, never return them, and all write for more. We have had meetings of agricultural associations in Tennessee, and not one has ever said a word in opposition to these seeds. The people who get the seeds are not protesting against them. It is an organized effort of private interests that expect to profit by being enabled to sell an inferior article of seed for more than they can now. Why, we farmers who do not wear our watch chains crossways, we all know that when you plant a common vegetable seed in a different section of the country from that in which it was grown you get a better result. Cabbage seed grown in Michigan gives better results for a few years in my State than home-grown seed. A farmer gets a paper of these seeds and plants them, makes seed, and next year he distributes them to his neighbors, and these covetous, greedy seed growers and dealers do not want them to grow their own seeds in this way from seed sent them by the Government—do not want them to have this little Agricultural Department nest egg—and they come here and propose to teach us what democracy is.

Why, we vote money out of the Treasury for almost every object under the heavens, Constitution or no Constitution, and whenever the constitutional lawyers of the other side get to drawing lines against the farmers as to a few mustard seed, cabbage seed, and bean seed, I think our friends over there will have a very difficult task in undertaking to defend such a course in the Congressional elections next fall, where it is so well known that the Constitution has been shot through with 13-inch shells by them until there is nothing left of it but holes. [Laughter.] Then talk about drawing the line against this little universal benefit to everybody in the country on constitutional grounds. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES of Virginia rose and was recognized.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to gentlemen to allow the Clerk to finish this next paragraph. Then the debate can proceed. There is no disposition to curtail it.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I understood that I was recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia was recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Not more than five minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At the expiration of that five minutes I propose to move that all debate on this paragraph be closed.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, during the progress of this debate gentlemen who are opposed to the expenditure by the Government of the comparatively small sum of $200,000 for seed, to be distributed to the farmers of the country, have read numerous letters and editorials written by persons who are opposed to this appropriation. On the other hand, it has been stated on this floor that the principal part of the opposition to this small appropriation comes from the seedsmen of the country. I believe that statement is absolutely true, and I have in my hand a letter written by an intelligent farmer in my district, recently a resident of Detroit, Mich., which I think establishes the fact that the seedsmen of this country are doing an immensely profitable business, and that their course in opposing any and all free distribution of seed by the Government is both selfish and unjustifiable. The distribution of these seed in the past has not injured at least one great concern engaged in growing and selling seed, as the letter which I hold in my hand and shall now read, fully and completely establishes.

I commend the statements contained in this letter particularly to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS], who read so many letters and editorials in an effort to show that the farmers are not favorable to any free distribution of seed. The writer is a farmer, and he knows something about the immense profits of the seedsmen.

GUINEYS, VA., March 14, 1906.

Hon. W. A. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I see the question of free-seed distribution is about to come before your body, and while I do not wish to be understood as advocating the indiscriminate distribution of each and every kind of seed, yet I am under the impression that the matter is being agitated by the seedsmen, more especially by those from whom the Government has made no purchases. Such being the case, I can probably give you some light in regard to one of the pleas that seedsmen may present, which is that this free distribution interferes with their business and makes the seed business unprofitable.

I was bookkeeper for five years (from 1895 to 1900) for a brother-in-law of D. M. Ferry, president of D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, Mich., and for three or four years transacted the custom-house business for their Canada branch. During this period the free-seed distribution was agitated as it is now. A reporter interviewed Mr. Bowen, the then secretary of D. M. Ferry & Co., on the subject. Mr. Bowen went on to say that he thought the Government was committing an outrage upon the seedsmen of the country, who, he claimed, were none too prosperous. Now, from this expression of Mr. Bowen's, that his house was really suffering from said practice, whereas D. M. Ferry & Co. were really declaring a dividend of 75 per cent per year on their capital stock. Mr. Sherman R. Miller, for whom I kept books, owned $35,000 worth of said stock, from which he drew annually $26,250. This house, of course, was none too prosperous.

I do not think Congress should object to appropriating $250,000 for its vast horde of toilers, while one seed house clears $750,000 on these same toilers. I don't mean for this to influence you at all; use your own judgment. It is merely information I am furnishing.

Yours, truly, G. W. MOSS.

Mr. Chairman, the writer of this letter is a gentleman of high character and unquestioned veracity. I satisfied myself as to his standing before I decided to use his letter. He declares that the firm of D. M. Ferry & Co., of Detroit, Mich., is paying a dividend of 75 per cent upon its stock, paying dividends amounting in the aggregate to $750,000 a year. These are the people who object to the farmers receiving a few free seeds, because, as they claim, their profits are none too large, and the Government should not interfere even to so limited an extent with those profits.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the paragraph be closed.

Mr. CANDLER. Is that motion subject to debate?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. CANDLER. Then I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. RUCKER. Before that motion is put I would like to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANDLER) there were—ayes 97, noes 63.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be printed and bound in cloth 200,000 copies of the Special Report on Diseases of the Horse and 200,000 copies of the Special Report on the Diseases of Cattle, 128,000 copies of each for the use of the House of Representatives, 64,000 of each for the use of the Senate, and 8,000 copies of each for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order that that is new legislation carrying an appropriation, and there is no law for it. That is a matter that can be attended to by the Committee on Printing. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.

Salaries, Bureau of Plant Industry: One plant physiologist and pathologist, who shall be chief of bureau, $4,500; one chief clerk, $2,000; one editor, $2,000; one superintendent of gardens and grounds, $1,800; four clerks class 4, $7,200; seven clerks class 3, $11,200; twelve clerks class 2, $16,800; twenty-seven clerks class 1, $32,400; one seed clerk and superintendent, $1,200; one clerk or artist, $1,200; one artist, $840; fourteen clerks, at $1,000 each, $14,000; six clerks, at $900 each, $5,400; eight clerks, at $840 each, $6,720; one clerk, $800; eleven clerks, at $720 each, $7,920; three clerks, at $660 each, $1,980; two clerks, at $600 each, $1,200; one clerk, $480; one photographer or clerk, $900; one assistant photographer, $600; one illustrator and clerk, $720; one carpenter, $900; one carpenter, $840; two gardeners, at $1,000 each, $2,000; four gardeners, at $900 each, $3,600; two gardeners, at $840 each, $1,680; four gardeners, at $780 each, $3,120; one gardener, $600; one gardener, $720; two gardeners, at $660 each, $1,320; one skilled laborer, $900; one painter, $840; two plumbers, at $840 each, $1,680; three firemen, at $720 each, $2,160; two clerks or messengers, at $840 each, $1,680; three skilled laborers, at $720 each, $2,160; three skilled laborers, at $660 each, $1,980; six skilled laborers, at $600 each, $3,600; one messenger, $660; three messengers, at $600 each, $1,800; three watchmen, at $720 each, $2,160; two watchmen, at $600 each, $1,200; two skilled laborers or messengers, at $480 each, $960; four messenger boys, at $360 each, $1,440; one messenger boy, $300; in all, $160,160.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is at the end of the statutory salaries. Why not wait until he gets through with the paragraph to the lump sum—in other words, at the end of the next paragraph?

Mr. CANDLER. I am not going to offer an amendment now; I am only going to speak.

Mr. MANN. We want to hear you.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed, it seems to have been the unanimous custom to extend the remarks five minutes beyond the usual time. I am frank to say that I do not expect to get through in five minutes, and I would like unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, the morning after it was stated in the public press in the city of Washington that the Committee on Agriculture had stricken from the bill the provision carrying the usual appropriation for the distribution of seeds another article appeared, which stated that—

In 1839 there was no Department of Agriculture, but that year Congress appropriated $1,000 to enable the Commissioner of Patents to purchase and distribute rare and valuable seeds and to publish agricultural statistics.

In 1893 the appropriations for the Department of Agriculture had grown to about $3,000,000 and the appropriation for the purchase and distribution of seeds had reached $150,000. Secretary J. Sterling Morton looked upon this free distribution as petty graft, and he refused to "purchase and distribute." But Congress made the distribution mandatory, and each year the appropriation has been increased, until for the current twelve months it is $250,000 in round figures. This year the agricultural appropriation bill carries $7,000,000.

It concludes with this significant remark:

Last week the Committee on Agriculture struck the seed clause from the appropriation bill, and at noon to-day there will be a gathering of seedsmen from all over the country at the New Willard for the purpose of devising means to keep that seed clause out of the bill.

And immediately there gathered from all over the country the kind of farmers whose protests against seed have been read in this debate here to-day—the agriculturists, the ones that farm with their jaws and farm with their tongues, and never are found between the plow handles or with a hoe in their hands.

Mr. JOHNSON. The farmers that plow in the field and work with the hoe do not come to Washington and stop at the New Willard Hotel, do they?

Mr. CANDLER. No, sir; they do not. These men who farm with their jaws and their tongues are the ones who stop at the New Willard Hotel and oppose this free distribution of seeds. Not a letter has been received from a single farmer in the country who follows the plow——

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me to read some letters that I have here from farmers?

Mr. CANDLER. I have the highest personal regard for the gentleman from Connecticut and wish I could yield, but really have not the time and must decline to yield for the present. The gentleman from New York, my friend Mr. COCKS, read a letter which he said was from a farmer, and when he was asked what kind of a farmer he was, he said he was a florist that farmed beneath the glass. Yes; he was a farmer inside of a hothouse. "Hothouse" and "agriculturist" farmers in this country, who do no work themselves, are opposed to the distribution of seeds. [Laughter.] The real farmers, who actually work, want them. I have received almost in every mail, I believe, since I sent out my original distribution, requests for seed up to the present day, and I could bring into this House letters by the hundreds from farmers that till the soil, from farmers' wives, and from farmers' daughters asking me to send them garden seeds and flower seeds in order to plant the garden and to beautify the home. [Applause.]

I opposed strenuously in committee the motion to strike the seed appropriation from the pending bill.

I want to respond to the requests that come from the farmers themselves, and I am willing to turn a deaf ear to these silk-hat, kid-gloved, high-collared, patent-leather-shoed, spike-tailed-coat "agriculturists," that hold their conventions in the New Willard Hotel, in order to keep the farmers of the country from receiving a package of seeds to which they are entitled. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to tell this House whether or not they cut out of this bill the appropriation that tests the seeds that the Government buys.

Mr. CANDLER. If the bill passes as reported all seed are cut out, and necessarily all tests of seed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do they not test the seed that the Government buys?

Mr. CANDLER. They certainly do, and I will come to that directly. I do not want to discuss that right now. I am going to show from a letter that the seed are thoroughly tested. As I was saying, if you will investigate for yourselves you will find that there are no farmers who follow the plow and that actually work in the fields, and by their brawn and muscle build up the wealth of this country, who are opposed to the distribution of seed.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have letters from some here.

Mr. CANDLER. It is very remarkable that this seed distribution has become such a species of graft all at once. If so, there has been the greatest army of grafters in the United States of America that ever appeared in the world, because this appropriation began in 1865, and there has been an appropriation every year since, down to 1906; and if it is "graft" now, the "grafters" began in 1865, and continued from then until this day. It was never thought to be graft to send to the honest farmers of the country a package of garden seeds, and to his wife a package of flower seeds, until the seed trust met at the New Willard Hotel and said it was "graft," and some "statesmen" adopted their suggestion. The total amount of appropriations for garden seed for this purpose during all these years—from 1865 to 1905—is only the comparative small sum of $4,767,526.21, and, as I showed the other day in a speech that I delivered on this floor, the total appropriations for the Agricultural Department from the time of its organization down to to-day has only been the comparatively small sum of $65,000,000 for every purpose, from beginning to end, in connection with all the Agricultural Department's work. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKS] said that the Secretary of Agriculture was opposed to the distribution of seeds and wrote a letter in which he referred to some statement in a report that he had made. Here is a letter from Mr. Galloway, who is Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and he does not say that he is opposed to the distribution of seeds, but, on the contrary, he says the following:

There is little doubt in my mind that such distribution accomplished more or less good.

In connection with that he takes up the distribution of the special seeds, which are tobacco and cotton and things of that kind, and he advocates that very strongly. In this bill there is no provision for any of that work; not a particle. It absolutely takes away from the Department of Agriculture the right to distribute seed for any purpose, and the only appropriation provided for in this bill is a provision for the propagation and the testing of seeds in connection with the experiment stations; no distribution provided for; not a particle. Nowhere in the bill does it say you can send out a single solitary seed, but it is only for the purpose of experimentation, solely for the purpose of cooperation with the experiment stations. I asked the question because there was some doubt about that, and I had gentlemen come to me and ask me whether or not it would stop the distribution of all kinds of seeds if this provision was left out of the bill. I read from a letter which I received from the Department:

In the absence of Mr. Galloway, I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 28th instant. If the appropriation for the distribution of seeds is eliminated, the distribution of all seed would be discontinued, including vegetable, flower, lawn grass, tobacco, cotton seed, shrubbery, plants, grapevines, etc.

Mr. Galloway, the Chief of Bureau of Plant Industry, on his return wrote to me corroborating what Mr. Wood, the acting chief in his absence, said, and said in addition to that that "it would discontinue the seed, not only the miscellaneous and garden and flower seed, but everything in the way of new cottons, tobaccos, corns and cereals, and everything else.

We have been expending something between $50,000 and $60,000 a year in the general seed work, including our introduction of new things. This money was involved in the regular seed distribution and, of course, would be eliminated with the rest if the action of the committee is sustained.

Now, then, you gentlemen who represent tobacco districts, and you gentlemen who represent cotton districts, and you gentlemen who represent any district of any kind where you have been sending specific and special seed, I tell you that if this provision is left out of the bill it will take away from you all classes of seed of every kind, and you will have not a single solitary seed to send to anybody for any purpose.

Mr. Chairman, something was said about the testing of the seeds. Here is what the Chief of the Bureau says in reference to that:

The Department has a thorough system of handling the entire work, the object being to secure the very best seed obtainable and to be certain that they are true to type. A considerable portion of the seed sent out is grown for the Department out of selected stock. In order to keep thoroughly abreast of the times in these matters a number of testing stations have been established where not only the miscellaneous varieties are thoroughly tested to determine their trueness to type, but everything promising offered by seedsmen is also tested with a view to making use of it in the future distribution. The Department has adopted the most rigid system of testing for vitality, purity, etc. The Bureau of Plant Industry devotes a considerable part of its work to this subject, so that all seeds from whatever source are thoroughly tested before they are sent out. They are tested not only to determine their trueness to name and type, but for their vitality and for their purity.

Therefore, if that be true, they must be the best seeds that can be obtained from any part of the country, and especially must it be true that a great part of them are sent out from seed grown by the Department of Agriculture itself. Now, he goes on to state under the head of "the securing and distributing of comparatively new or little known varieties of field and forest plant seeds and the improvement of the same by breeding."

Under this head I may briefly refer to a class of work which I consider of great importance in the building up of agricultural industries in this country. As you know, special attention has been given during the last four or five years to the securing and distributing throughout the South of new and promising varieties of cotton. Oftentimes these cottons are secured from individual planters who have for a number of years been carefully selecting and thus have bred a type somewhat better than is ordinarily found among growers. Our cotton experts and breeders have been on the lookout for all these new and promising improvements and every year we have sent out quantities of them for trial. In addition to this our men are, by their own work, securing desirable new types which are distributed as fast as developed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to continue for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to continue for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANDLER (reading from letter from the Agricultural Department)—

This is necessarily slow and costly work, but unquestionably is having a very important effect on the agricultural conditions of the South. We have many hundreds of reports from the new and improved cotton seeds that we have sent out, all showing their increased value over the ordinary kinds.

The other day the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] told me that in his district he met one of his constituents with two samples of cotton, one in one hand and one in the other; that he had the cotton on the market. He said, "This cotton I raised from the ordinary seed which I had; I am offered 11½ cents for the cotton in that lot grown from ordinary seed. This sample of cotton was grown from seed that came from the Agricultural Department, and for this cotton from this sample grown from this seed I am offered 13½ cents." [Applause.] That was the statement, as I understood it. Now, that was 2 cents a pound, or $10 a bale, more for the cotton grown from seed prepared by the Agricultural Department than that grown from the ordinary seed that the farmer had saved from his crop of the preceding year.

Mr. LEVER arose and corroborated the statement.

Mr. CANDLER (reading further from the letter)—

What has been said of cotton is also true of other crops, such as improved cowpeas—varieties that will resist wilt—improved melons, and improved forage crops. A special effort is being made in this direction in the matter of improving the forage crop conditions in all parts of the country, and our records will show, I think, that this work alone pays many times over the total amount appropriated for seeds and plants. As a special feature of this work may be mentioned the tobacco investigations which have been carried on from year to year, and which have had for their object the development of new types which will enable the growers of different sections to place upon the market the very highest class product. Work in Connecticut, Florida, and some of the other States has demonstrated the great value of these investigations, and this year for the first time the Department is in position to send out seeds of the specially bred types, the result of our investigations for the last three or four years.

Now, then, refuse to reinsert the appropriation and you destroy the work of the Department, which has already been done for the last three or four years in this line and just now only reaching perfection where it can reach the people. As soon as it gets to the point where the people can have the benefit of it, then you propose to take it away from them by taking away this little, small, insignificant appropriation, which has been in the bill from time to time, and which has been stricken out by the committee this year. Now, then, it is said in this report that was made as the report of the committee that there never has been any law for this distribution. I assert there is law for it. You will find it in the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture, in which it says they shall gather and propagate and distribute seed; it says so in so many words in the act creating the Department of Agriculture, and that is the law which authorizes the distribution. You will find in another statute the law that authorizes the printing of "franks" and everything necessary to be done that the seed may be sent out, and upon these statutes stand the authority for this distribution which has been made from year to year. Possibly you would believe it was practically unanimous in the committee, according to this report, to strike out the seed appropriation, but that is not the situation. In the committee the first vote was eight to seven, the next vote was six to seven, and the final vote was a tie vote. It was badly divided in the committee so far as that is concerned. Hence I say to you that I believe, in view of the facts I have stated, that this appropriation ought to be reinserted, that the seed ought to be sent to the farmers throughout the country who desire them, and we should not act upon the statements in newspaper articles, such as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] referred to a few minutes ago, when he said he asked a man in his district why he printed a certain article in his newspaper, and he replied, "You send on the seed. My columns are open to advertisements."

I have read many editorials myself. Some of them have been marked and sent to me. I want to know from whence comes this newspaper uprising against seed, all of a sudden, without any seeming cause for it? It may be explained in the statement made by the "seed trust"—they would use the press to prevent this seed appropriation being made this year. [Applause.] That statement was made in some of the newspapers the next day after the "kid-glove seedsmen" held their meeting at the New Willard Hotel. Now, gentlemen, the question is whether you will vote for the seed trust or the working farmers. Line up with the seed trust if you want to and take the consequences. If we want to practice economy, it should be something larger than the one which is involved here. And if we want to practice economy, we ought to practice it on somebody besides the farmers who take care of the country and uphold its prosperity and pays its debts abroad. [Prolonged applause.]

As a part of my remarks I append hereto the letters to which I have referred and which are as follows:

U. S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1906.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CANDLER: I have your letter of recent date, asking for full information relative to the purchase and distribution of seeds and plants by the Department. In order to bring the facts together in concrete form, I will take them up under certain heads, as suggested in your letter.

1. Total amounts appropriated and expended for seeds and plants since 1865, when the Department was organized.

Year.	Appropriated.	Expended.	Year.	Appropriated.	Expended.
1865	$61,000.00	$61,000.00	1886	$100,000.00	$99,980.24
1866	70,165.90	70,165.90	1887	100,000.00	99,998.37
1867	115,200.00	115,200.00	1888	103,000.00	102,587.55
1868	85,200.00	85,200.00	1889	104,200.00	104,168.73

(a) For drought sufferers. Not used.

Total appropriations, $4,767,526.21.

In the foregoing table we have set forth the total amount appropriated and spent for seeds and plants since 1865. The figures are self-explanatory, but it must be borne in mind that they cover all expenditures and are not for miscellaneous garden and flower seeds alone.

2. HOW THE WORK HAS BEEN HANDLED.

The business of securing, handling, and sending out the seeds and plants of the Department has been conducted in various ways. For a time the Department did all the work, but as it grew the labor proposition became a serious one. The plan of letting out the work by contract was then resorted to, the contractor furnishing all seeds and labor, under the supervision of Department officers. The contract system was kept up until five years ago, when the whole work was turned over to the Bureau of Plant Industry. There were serious defects in the contract system, it being impracticable in this way to secure the very best seeds and for the Department to exercise proper supervision over it. When the work was turned over to the Bureau of Plant Industry an effort was made to thoroughly systematize it and to put it on a practical business basis. To this end arrangements were made for the Department to secure all the seed, in this way exercising absolute control over the kinds of seed secured, their vitality, trueness to name, and other essential things.

3. KINDS OF WORK CARRIED ON.

The work of seed and plant distribution as now conducted by the Bureau of Plant Industry falls under three principal heads, viz:

(a) The securing, handling, and distributing of miscellaneous garden and flower seeds, grapevines, strawberry plants, etc.

(b) The securing and distributing of comparatively new or little-known kinds of various field and forage crop seeds, such as cotton, corn, alfalfa, etc.; the improvement of the same by breeding and selection, and the general upbuilding of agricultural industries through such work.

(c) The introduction and dissemination of new and promising seeds and plants from foreign countries and the building up of new industries as the result of this work.

(a) THE SECURING, HANDLING, AND DISTRIBUTING OF MISCELLANEOUS GARDEN AND FLOWER SEEDS, ETC.

This work, as now conducted, costs about two-thirds of the total amount appropriated. The Department has a thorough system of handling the entire work, the object being to secure the very best seeds obtainable and to be certain that they are true to type. A considerable portion of the seed sent out is grown for the Department out of selected stock. In order to keep thoroughly abreast of the times in these matters a number of testing stations have been established where not only all of the miscellaneous varieties sent out are thoroughly tested to determine their trueness to type, but everything promising offered by seedsmen is also tested, with a view to making use of it in future distributions. The Department has adopted the most rigid system of testing the vitality and purity of the seeds. The seed laboratory of the Bureau of Plant Industry devotes a considerable part of its work to this subject, so that all seeds from whatever source are thoroughly tested before they are sent out. They are tested not only to determine their trueness to name and type, but their vitality and purity.

As to the value of this miscellaneous distribution of garden and flower seeds, it is very difficult to state what it may be. There is little doubt in my mind that such distribution accomplishes more or less good. Very few reports are received, however, and in the nature of the case it is impossible for us to use any but standard varieties in the distribution, because the quantities required make it impossible to use the rarer sorts. When this distribution was first undertaken a great many years ago there is no doubt that it accomplished much good, because at that time the seed industry was not as thoroughly organized as it is to-day. The practice of ordering through the mails from seed catalogues was not then in vogue, and it was extremely difficult for persons living in isolated localities to secure good garden seeds. This condition has changed, however, and to-day it is quite possible for anyone to buy garden seeds of the same varieties as we distribute.

(b) THE SECURING AND DISTRIBUTING OF COMPARATIVELY NEW OR LITTLE-KNOWN VARIETIES OF FIELD AND FORAGE PLANT SEEDS, AND THE IMPROVEMENT OF SAME BY BREEDING.

Under this head I may briefly refer to a class of work which I consider of great importance in the building up of agricultural industries in this country. As you know, special attention has been given during the last four or five years to the securing and distributing throughout the South of new and promising varieties of cotton. Oftentimes these cottons are secured from individual planters who have for a number of years been carefully selecting and thus have bred a type somewhat better than is ordinarily found among growers. Our cotton experts and breeders have been on the lookout for all of these new and promising improvements, and every year we have sent out quantities of them for trial. In addition to this our men are, by their own work, securing desirable new types, which are distributed as fast as developed. This is necessarily slow and costly work, but unquestionably is having a very important effect on the agricultural conditions of the South. We have many hundreds of reports from the new and improved cotton seeds that we have sent out, all showing their increased value over the ordinary kinds.

What has been said of cotton is also true of other crops, such as improved cowpeas, varieties that will resist wilt; improved melons and improved forage crops. A special effort is being made in this direction in the matter of improving the forage-crop conditions in all parts of the country, and our records will show, I think, that this work alone pays many times over the total amount appropriated for seeds and plants. As a special feature of this work may be mentioned the tobacco investigations which have been carried on from year to year and which have had for their object the development of new types which will enable the growers of different sections to place upon the market the very highest class product. Work in Connecticut, Florida, and some of the other States has demonstrated the great value of these investigations, and this year for the first time the Department is in position to send out seeds of the specially bred types, the result of our investigations for the last three or four years.

(c) THE INTRODUCTION AND DISSEMINATION OF NEW AND PROMISING SEEDS AND PLANTS FROM FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

This work, conducted as a part of the general seed and plant investigations, is one of the most important branches of the Department. In the last five years a number of new things have been brought in and established as distinct industries. Among them may be mentioned the macaroni wheat, which was first introduced five or six years ago. The annual yield of this crop is now from 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 bushels, valued at from ten to fifteen million dollars. Another important introduction has been the Swedish oat, which has resulted in great improvement in the grain-growing conditions in the Northwest, one State, namely, Minnesota, estimating the value of this crop at over $4,500,000. Other important crops introduced and established are new alfalfas. Japanese matting grass, date palms, etc. We import every year about $5,000,000 worth of matting for floor covering, and of this amount $2,000,000 practically represents the value of the raw material. This matting can be manufactured in the United States, and the rice lands of South Carolina, Texas, and Louisiana are well adapted to the cultivation of the grass. We have established gardens in South Carolina for the culture of this crop and confidently anticipate that in a few years we will add this as one of the new industries of the South.

The whole work of the introduction of new varieties, whether found in the United States or imported from abroad, is so nearly connected that the distinction is really an arbitrary one. For the purpose of administrative economy the two are handled together, the seeds and plants received from foreign explorations being in most cases tested and introduced together with those developed in the United States. To carry on all of this work intelligently and to the best interests of the Department, we have found it necessary to establish a number of testing gardens, through which we are trying to determine the crops best adapted to certain regions of the country. Thus we have a testing garden at Chico, Cal., where we are testing and distributing plants adapted to the temperate parts of the United States. Here are being tested and distributed new fruits for the Pacific coast, new forage crops for the dryer regions of the United States, new cereals for different sections of the country, and various new crops particularly adapted to the Northwest regions. At Amarillo, Tex., we have another station where we are testing drought-resistant crops especially. These include the newer durum wheats, sorghums, Kaffir corns, and crops of this nature. At San Antonio, Tex., we have another station where we are testing crops for the semiarid region. We have a grain-testing station at McPherson, Kans., where new wheats and other grains are being tested.

All of this work is being paid for out of the general appropriation for seeds and plants. I consider the work under the two last heads, namely, the securing and distributing of new or little-known varieties of field, forage, and other seeds, plants, etc., found in this country, and the securing and distribution of seeds and plants, etc., from foreign countries, of the utmost importance to American agriculture. I believe that the total amount now authorized for the entire work could very well be devoted to these problems.

I trust I have answered your inquiries fully, and for further and more detailed information, would respectfully refer you to my executive report made to the honorable Secretary in 1905, in which is set forth in detail the various lines of investigation and in general in what manner the work is being applied in a practical way to the agricultural development of the country.

Very respectfully,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chief of Bureau.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY.
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1906.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CANDLER: In the absence of Mr. Galloway, who will not return to the city until Friday or Saturday, I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 28th ultimo. If the appropriation for the distribution of seed were eliminated, the distribution of all seed would be discontinued, including vegetable, flower, lawn grass, tobacco, and cotton seed, strawberry plants, grapevines, etc.

Trusting this information will serve your purpose, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

A. F. WOODS, Acting Chief of Bureau.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., March 3, 1906.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER, Jr.,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. CANDLER: As explained in the letter to you signed by the acting chief, dated March 1, I have been out of the city for a few days and have just returned. I note your inquiry as to whether the distribution of new varieties and types of cotton, tobacco, flower, and other seeds would be discontinued if the action of the committee in eliminating the appropriation for this work is sustained. In reply I beg to reiterate what Mr. Woods, the acting chief, has already stated, viz: That all of our seed work would be discontinued under this plan. This would include not only the miscellaneous garden and flower seeds, but everything in the way of new cottons, tobacco, corns, cereals, etc. We have been spending, as you know, between $50,000 and $60,000 in all for the general seed work, including our introductions of new things. This money was involved in the regular seed distribution, and of course would be eliminated with the rest if the action of the committee is sustained.

Trusting this information will answer your questions and assuring you of my desire to give any further facts on the subject, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

B. F. GALLOWAY, Chief of Bureau.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. In this appropriate connection I ask the indulgence of the House for brief remarks concerning the tobacco industry, more especially referring to the growing of wrapper tobacco in tents, or, in other words, shade-grown wrappers.

It is conceded that shade growing in Florida is a success, but assertions are repeatedly made that the efforts of the Department of Agriculture to introduce novel and improved methods of tobacco culture in the Connecticut Valley are at least partial failures.

Six years ago, in 1900, the Connecticut State agricultural station, under the able supervision of Dr. E. H. Jenkins, assisted by experts from the Department of Agriculture, raised about one-third of an acre of tobacco under thin cloth, using Florida-grown Sumatra seed. This tobacco was widely distributed among cigar manufacturers and pronounced nearly equal to wrappers imported from the island of Sumatra. The following year, in 1901, over 40 acres was grown in tents, the growers more or less strictly complying with the instructions of the Government experts. This tobacco was force cured, carefully assorted, prepared for market, and sold by auction at Hartford under the indirect supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture. The best grades sold for over $2 per pound, all grades bringing an average price of about $1.50 per pound. The estimated cost of production was 50 cents per pound, netting a profit of $500 per acre.

When this somewhat surprising result was given publicity, a speculative boom was inaugurated. Inexperienced, and sometimes unprincipled, promoters issued alluring prospectuses after the manner of their kind, solicited capital from the unwary, bought unsuitable lands regardless of cost, and paid unearned dividends from stock subscriptions, with the inevitable sequence that much money was lost and a promising industry temporarily discredited.

Under the incentive of a misleading delusion nearly 800 acres of tobacco, mainly of the Sumatra type, was grown under cloth in 1902, and about the same acreage in 1903. Reckless and inexperienced growers were heedless of expert advice and apt to be careless in indispensible details.

The seasons of both 1902 and 1903 were wet and cold, unfavorable alike for indoor and outdoor-grown tobacco. Tent grown especially was of inferior quality and unsaleable at remunerative prices. Quite naturally the faint-hearted and inexperienced abandoned a business found unprofitable. Nevertheless a few veteran growers retained confidence in the new industry and energetically continued experimental work. The tent-covered acreage was larely reduced, and growers avoided mistakes of former years. Seed was more carefully selected, better methods of cultivation, handling, and curing were introduced.

Experts detailed by Doctor Galloway, of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and Professor Whitney, of the Bureau of Soils, have developed both native and hybrid types, which hopefully give promise not only of superior quality, but also of a larger percentage of wrappers, an important matter in the Connecticut Valley, where filler tobacco is always sold at a loss. These experiments are closely watched by intelligent and enterprising farmers, and are believed to forecast more prosperous conditions for the tobacco industry.

As an illustration of the confidence representative Connecticut tobacco growers have in new methods of culture recommended by the Department of Agriculture, I quote pertinent extracts from a letter received from Mr. Joseph C. Mitchelson, a well-known gentleman of wide experience as a practical tobacco grower, upon lands his family have owned for more than two centuries. Mr. Mitchelson was also for many years a manufacturer and dealer, exceptionally and thoroughly familiar with the tobacco industry in all its varied phases. Under date of January 15, 1906, Mr. Mitchelson writes in part as follows:

Predicting from my own experience and from what the Government has taught us, we shall see within a few years a great revolution in the methods of growing and curing wrapper tobacco. As an indication that I am right in this conclusion, I can say that we have sold our shade grown raised in 1905, about 21 acres, for over $1,100 per acre. We are so well satisfied with the price obtained that we propose next year to raise not less than 50 acres under cloth.

* * * * * * *

We picked the leaves in the field from a part of our outside tobacco and secured three times as many perfect wrappers as from plants in the same field cut and cured in the old way—on the stalk.

* * * * * * *

All perfect leaves should be picked and cured independent from the stalk. Green leaves hung in a bunch on the stalk are apt to pole-burn, bottom leaves become overripe and are lost if not picked, while top leaves are not fully ripened, center leaves become discolored and stained, the air not circulating as freely as when picked and hung separately. There is over 95 per cent of water in green leaves, and this moisture should pass away as soon as possible.

* * * * * * *

The crop of 1905 was one of the finest ever raised in New England, but it was injured in harvesting, and great loss was sustained from hanging in the old-fashioned way and curing on the stalk.

* * * * * * *

If the Government experts are permitted to continue their experiments and go among our farmers explaining improved methods of handling and curing, the crop of next year should be largely improved in quality and increased in value.

Mr. Marcus L. Floyd, formerly connected with the Department of Agriculture, but more recently engaged in growing tobacco in Connecticut, writes in a recent letter:

After a long struggle it seems we are now about to produce tobacco in the Connecticut Valley which will meet the requirements of manufacturers for wrapping high-priced cigars.

* * * * * * *

I think that the experience of the last two years in tent growing is very satisfactory. In 1904 we produced 10 acres of tobacco grown under cloth from Cuban seed, which brought us over $1,000 per acre, with a net profit of about $500 per acre. This tobacco was sold to manufacturers, and the purchasers report that the quality was satisfactory.

* * * * * * *

Our 1905 crop was even more successful. We grew 9 acres 48 rods of broad leaf in tent. This acreage produced 14,147 pounds, weighed after forced curing was completed. This tobacco was sold for 75 cents per pound, through price, bringing $10,610.25 less a 2 per cent discount for cash, and netting $10,398.05.

* * * * * * *

We have also grown 10 acres of Cuban in tent. The bottom or sand leaves, always inferior, I have sold for export to Germany, at 75 cents per pound, and the remainder is engaged for a much higher price, three customers bidding.

* * * * * * *

The scientists from the Department of Agriculture have certainly obtained some surprising results from their experimental work in the tobacco fields of Connecticut, and I believe that still other important problems remain to be worked out along the lines designated by Secretary Wilson.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to recognize the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY] next in opposition, unless the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLERBE] is in opposition.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I will detain this House but a very short time. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make a speech for home consumption and simply wish to answer the challenge of a great many gentlemen who have said there were no farmers opposed to the distribution of seed and only seed dealers were opposed to it. I have a number of letters here, and I will just read briefly from some of them. One is from the Cloverdale Farm, Litchfield, Conn.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Before the gentleman begins I would like to ask him one question.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. All right.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. All of those letters are on printed letter heads, are they not?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A great majority of them, are they not?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I see a majority——

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. They are from the kind of farmers that farm the people?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I find that a majority of them are not on printed letter heads. These are not the spike-toed farmers that the gentleman from Mississippi referred to. We do not grow them in New England. The letter is as follows.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Are you supplying your people seed to grow wooden nutmegs?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. The only market we now have for wooden nutmegs is from the gentleman's State, Missouri. [Applause.]

Seeds received. I hope Congress will find time this session to abolish free distribution.

Here is one from the Hautboy Hill farm:

As long as Congress sees fit to send out seed I shall be glad to get my share, but I believe it to be unjust. On the same principle appropriations should be made to furnish us with agricultural implements and improved live stock.

Here is another:

You are a good fellow, LILLEY, and my chickens appear to like your seed, but the whole damned business is of no benefit to agriculture.

[Applause.]

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Is that from a farmer?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is on a printed letter head, I believe.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No, sir.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Turn it over and see if it is not.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No, sir; it is on my own letter head stating that I had sent him a package of the seed.

Here is another:

I am sure your constituents almost to a man are opposed to the garden-seed nuisance. Please send me an Ayrshire bull and $25,000 in cash.

Mr. MANN. Why should that man be opposed to 5 cents' worth of seeds?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I sent him the cash, but did not have the bull.

Here is another letter:

We received your seed all right, but do not appreciate them.

And another:

That every one of our Congressmen may do all in their power to prevent any appropriation for free-seed distribution is the earnest wish of your farmer constituents.

Here is a postscript that I will read:

All honor to Congressman HENRY for his position in this matter.

[Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Go ahead.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do most of the farmers up in your district use typewriters to write their letters down here?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have not read a typewritten letter yet.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut (reading)—

I think that a purposeless system of gratuity that burdens our post-office ought to be discontinued—and there you have my opinion, as a farmer.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Who signs that?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut (reading)—

If the Government has any more seeds to send me I should prefer their value in cash or postage-stamps, which would be cheaper for the Post-Office Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What sort of seeds did you send him? Did you send him the right sort for your climate?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I sent his frank with 12,000 others to the Agricultural Department.

Mr. TALBOTT. How many requests did you get of that kind?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I do not know.

Mr. TALBOTT. What percentage of the 12,000 did you receive responses to like that?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. The time of my colleague has been taken from him by interruptions, and I ask unanimous consent that his time may be extended.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask that the time of the gentleman may be extended for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Connecticut be extended ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I do not think I shall use that much time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, will the gentleman tell the committee what kind of seed would suit that country where you raise ice?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I do.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I really would like to know what kind of vegetables you raise there?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. All kinds of vegetables.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will you give me all yours next time? I will send them to Republicans in my district if you will do so.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. There will be no "next time."

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say that one of the replies which he read was written upon a letter which he sent to his constituent informing him that he had sent him a package of seeds.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Well, yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. I understand that he said that he wrote that to every one.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Yes; to every one.

Mr. MANN. How many letters did the gentleman receive protesting against the distribution of seeds?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Well, I can not tell you; I received a great many.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman produced all of them?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No, sir.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has produced a dozen or so that have been written to him in reply to 12,000 letters.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Let me say in regard to that I have ten letters—I have twenty letters—of disapproval to one that has approved the sending out of seeds.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know, but that would not answer the question. If the gentleman would only answer how many of the 12,000 he wrote to protested or expressed disapproval that would be a matter of some information.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I should say that the ratio would be about twenty to one of those that disapproved against those who approved.

Mr. JAMES. What is the character of letter you sent?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Just a line saying that I had sent them the seed.

Mr. JAMES. I would like you to read that letter.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut (reading)—

It may therefore seem a little bit ungracious of me to write advocating the discontinuance in large measure of the governmental practice.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to hear the whole of it.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. That will be something that is not directly pertinent.

I have been remembered by you on frequent occasions in the way of garden seeds and perhaps other things "not tied down" at Washington.

Mr. JAMES. What I ask for is the letter that you sent to your constituents with the seeds.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut (reading)—

That the Government seeds I am sending you under another cover may grow and flourish is the earnest wish of——

Mr. MANN. A good letter.

Mr. JAMES. You hope they will flourish?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I did not express any opinion.

Mr. JAMES. You did not insinuate that they would not?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I said just what I have read to you, sir. [Reading:]

It may therefore seem a little bit ungracious for me to write advocating the discontinuance in large measure of this governmental practice. There is, I think, a growing sentiment against the gratuitous distribution of common seeds by the Department of Agriculture. What the Department can do in the way of introducing new seeds and plants, thereby enlarging the variety of the product of the farm and the garden, is in the right direction.

I do not want to take the time of the House reading all these letters.

Will you kindly use your influence against the free distribution of common garden seeds? My reasons for opposing it are as follows: First, the law creating the Department of Agriculture does not authorize the free distribution of common garden seed. Second, it is class legislation, and therefore pernicious in itself. Third, it is a waste of public money, as more than half of the seed distributed is never sown. Fourth, it overburdens the mail service, and is one cause for the deficit in postal revenues.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield for a moment?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Your constituents, it seems, do not want this seed. Now, will you let me show you here, as best I can, a whole armful of letters calling for seed, letters sent to me after I had sent out mine, all the seed allotted me? These letters are from black and white, old and young, the lame, the halt, Republicans and Democrats, and not a single protest from any man, woman, or child has come to me from my district.

Mr. SIMS. How many hundreds of them are there?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know how many there are. These came after all my quota of seeds had been sent out. Now, will my friend let me read just one paragraph, a few lines?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Not at present.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, what is that printed matter which the gentleman is holding with the letters? It is a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and a copy of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no; come here, sir, and look at these letters. Here they are. [Exhibiting a large number of letters.]

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I can not yield further now. If I have time I will later.

Here is a letter from the good old town of Litchfield:

I am obliged for your kindness in sending me the seeds, although I would very cheerfully go without the seeds if the law which authorizes their distribution could be abolished.

I thank you for package of seeds and accompanying letter. Of course as long as Congress sees fit to appropriate money for this purpose, it becomes your duty—disagreeable I have no doubt—to distribute them, and I am gratified, of course, that you should remember me. I can not avoid however, expressing the hope that you will do what you can to prevent any further appropriations for this purpose. There being no more reason, of course, why the Government should supply me with seeds than with coal or hen's eggs.

I dislike to seem to "look a gift horse in the mouth," but I am sure you will not accuse me of either ingratitude or impertinence.

We hope you will exert your influence to support the action of the Agricultural Committee in cutting out the free distribution of seed. We will not elaborate upon the subject, as we believe your good judgment after giving the matter slight consideration will convince you that this free seed distribution is a mighty bad piece of business, as well as bad politics, and an outrageously foolish expenditure of a vast sum of public money.

While I would not appear ungrateful and fully appreciate the courtesy on your part, allow me to say that past experience has taught me to say that "Government seeds" are so unreliable, both as to purity and vitality, as to be worthless. My observation leads me to believe that they are seldom trusted by any who wish a successful garden. I believe that you will best serve the country and its agricultural interests by using your influence and vote against the continuing of this custom, and I am strongly of the opinion that this is the conviction of most of your constituents.

Why don't you stop the seed-distribution nonsense, or at least enter a protest against it? It is my honest conviction that 99 per cent of the people who are the recipients of Government seeds from their Congressman smile at the simplicity of the graft, as beneficial only to those who sell the seed to the Government.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Do you believe that next to the last letter is a correct statement of the quality of the seeds that are being sent out?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I certainly do. I have had that complaint from a vast number of people.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. It is your judgment, is it, that the seeds that the Department send out are untrustworthy and impure and inferior seeds?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I don't know that they all are, but I know that a great many are.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Do you think a large per cent of them are?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I can not tell you what per cent.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Do you believe it is a large per cent?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have no idea what per cent. I believe that they are the commonest kind of common garden seed.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman from Connecticut permit a question?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I understand the gentleman from Connecticut to believe that the Agricultural Department sends out worthless seeds.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. No, sir; I believe the Agricultural Department sends out the best seeds that it can get under the circumstances. The Agricultural Department is laboring under difficulties in providing the seeds for Congressmen to send out. They must get immense quantities of seed, and they can not always get them from reliable sources. They have to do the best they can and get them where they can.

Mr. POWERS. Has the Secretary of Agriculture ever stated to any committee that he has difficulty in getting seeds to send out?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. People connected with the Agricultural Department have told me that they were obliged to take seed from quarters where they had rather not take them, but they were obliged to from the fact that they couldn't get as many as they wanted to from other sources.

Mr. POWERS. Has anything of that kind been reported by the Secretary of Agriculture to the committee?

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I do not know.

Mr. POWERS. I want to say to the gentleman that I have sent these seeds out for a great many years to the farmers, not to men who are not farmers. If the seeds are worthless, how does it happen that the seed trust called a meeting at the New Willard in order to protest against it? I should think that it would cure itself.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I think the gentleman from Maine is assuming a good deal in assuming that there is a seed trust. I do not know anything about that. I do know that the Government gets its seed very largely from the seed trust, if there is such a thing, the same source that retail dealers obtain them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. The gentleman said that they were the commonest sort of common seeds. Is that the sort of seed that these men raise?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman speaks about these being bad, rotten seed, so to speak. Here is what the Department says. I read from the hearing:

Mr. CANDLER. Then there is nothing sent out but fresh seed, and those have been thoroughly tested and found to be true to their type?
Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes; and good in vitality.
Mr. CANDLER. So that they ought to be the very best seed that are sent out.
Mr. GALLOWAY. Under the old practices, before the Department got its own seed, it was the custom to run in poor seed.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I am showing you that the seeds are all fresh.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I have not said that the seeds were rotten.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; that is my own word. I wanted to emphasize the gentleman's position. Now, on page 233 of the hearings this colloquy occurred:

Mr. CANDLER. All of them are tested?
Mr. GALLOWAY. All of them are tested.
Mr. CANDLER. Every one when they come in?
Mr. GALLOWAY. When they come in.

Mr. SCOTT. Is it possible to require bids or in any way introduce the element of competition?
Mr. GALLOWAY. Yes; we do that as far as we possibly can. For instance, we want 40,000 pounds of lettuce seed of a certain variety, and we know pretty well the men who can furnish that seed at different places in the Pacific coast region. We send each of those men a blank form and ask him to submit a proposal for that seed. They come in at a certain time, and unless there is some special reason we will give it to the man whose figures are the lowest, considering freight rates. Very frequently a bid on lettuce seed from, say, Chicago, although it might be a lower bid, would cost us more than if the bid came from some other section, on account of freight rates. We have to consider those things.
Mr. FIELD. Doctor, the common impression is that dealers, such as Landreth and others, destroy all the old stock, so that each year they offer to the public fresh seed. Is that true?
Mr. GALLOWAY. That is one of the fairy stories that go out.
Mr. CANDLER. Landreth does claim he destroys all the seed left over.
Mr. GALLOWAY. I can not speak for any particular firm, but it is the general practice to blend seed. It is not only the general practice to blend seed, but there are all sorts of apparatus and devices that have for their object the rejuvenation of seed—that is, polishing devices that make old seed look bright. There are certain devices that will rub the dust off. There are certain cases where, if they do not want seed to grow very well (where we get imported seed), they run them over hot plates to destroy some of the vitality. It is an object sometimes to have the seed, especially high-grade seed, low in vitality, the main object being to keep up the price.

Now, over on another page he states that the Department has already procured the seed for the next year, and we are asked to give the money now to pay for them. So you see that when you buy seeds they are "tested" by the Department. These seeds that are grown under Farmer Wilson's Department are the very best kind. These seeds that they send out over the country are the best seeds that can be had, and Doctor Galloway so states. Of course, seed that is grown South might not grow well in Connecticut.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to know who has the floor, the gentleman from Tennessee or the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We are working both sides of the aisle. I am for the people, and the gentleman from Connecticut is against them. [Laughter.] I am for the farmer, and my farmer friend is not.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. I am as much for the farmer as the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, no.

Mr. LILLEY of Connecticut. It depends upon the point of view. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to an appropriation for the free distribution of these ordinary garden seed, because I do not believe that it is any more a part of the function of this Government to distribute an article of no better quality than can be obtained at the nearest grocery than any other article that can be obtained at the same store. There is no more reason why we should distribute these common garden seeds, and no more excuse for such a distribution, than there would be in distributing postage stamps or pocketknives.

I am against graft in this form, as well as in every other form. I am against this appropriation, as I am against all such appropriations, because it is not good business, and regret that there is not more unanimity among the Members of this House to conduct the affairs of this country on thoroughly up-to-date business principles. I don't believe any Member of this House has any right to vote to spend the people's money any differently than he would spend his own money, if it were his own private enterprise that he was conducting instead of the affairs of this great nation.

Mr. ELLERBE. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I shall not ask that my time be extended beyond five minutes. Although one of Mr. WILLIAMS's Congressional "kids," I beg pardon of the House for saying that I am greatly surprised at the amount of levity displayed in the discussion of this serious question. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this question is serious to me, because I believe that wrapped up in this are principles or policies that will seriously affect the welfare of the people of this country. Let me say that I was born on a farm, and every honest dollar that I ever made in my life I made out of the ground. [Laughter.]

I want to say seriously this, that there is one thing that the farming classes of this country are beginning to realize, and that is that one of the greatest problems concerning the country today is the question of seed breeding. I have taken on the same soil on my plantation, with the same fertilizer, planted the same day, cultivated the same day, gathered the same day, and out of six varieties of cotton I have known as much as 800 pounds of seed cotton different per acre. Why? Because of the seed that is planted; and I was surprised when I heard the gentleman from Texas oppose this bill, because the very principle embedded here is what is going to give relief to the people of the boll-weevil section of Texas. [Applause.]

What is the Department doing to-day? It went to North Carolina and took a lot of king cotton seed raised there, sent it down to Texas, and it was found that the cotton would open from ten to twenty days earlier than the ordinary cotton. Gentlemen, in my district there are three counties which are affected with what we call "wilt." You plant the cotton, it comes up, and it soon wilts. We have used all kinds of fertilizers. We can not do anything with it, but I came here and I have found that they have what they call a "wilt-resisting cotton seed." I have sent those seed into my district, and if these seed are wilt-resistant, then we have saved those people and those farmers down there.

I stand here and I tell you that I advocate this free-seed distribution not because I can send Tom Jones in my district 25 cents' worth of seed, but because I am able to send him a little strawberry plant of good shipping qualities, and he may be able to ship those berries and have them keep well, and instead of making a thousand dollars an acre, as we have done in my country, he may be able to send such a berry of such keeping qualities that he makes $2,000 an acre. [Applause.] I want to say that the same thing that is true of cotton seed and strawberry plants is also true of these garden seeds, and I favor this because it does not provide simply for testing the purity of the seed, but here are the words that strike me: "Seeds suited to the different localities." I want to live to see the day when not only $200,000, but $1,000,000 shall be given to the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall gather around him a class of experts who shall scour the world and select the finest seeds and the finest plants and send them to those localities where they will do the most good, and I tell you, my friends, you would be astonished if you knew what vast good would come from such a plan as that. [Applause.]

I desire to say, in conclusion, that thousands and thousands of farmers plant the same seed year after year. I have brought from an adjacent county in my own district cotton seed, the same seed grown on sandy soil for three or four years, and put it into a stiff clay soil, and it would show a difference of from three to six hundred pounds an acre. I want to say the time has come when we owe it to the people to do a great deal more of this kind of work. They have not the facilities, they have not the means, they have not the training to carry on this work of experimentation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

Mr. ELLERBE. No; I promised to confine myself to five minutes, and I shall do so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Extend your remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. ELLERBE. No; I shall not extend in the RECORD. I do not want to. I am not talking for the RECORD. I believe in what I am saying. I believe this is a great work, and I believe when you knock this out, when you stop this great work, as I said, of scouring the country for plants and vegetables that are adapted to different localities, you are turning back the wheels of progress, and I believe that some day the farmers will realize your mistake and will rise up in their might and rectify the great wrong that you may do here to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAY and Mr. LAMB) there were—ayes 79, noes 85.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. LAMB were appointed tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 78.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the agricultural appropriation bill, and had directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5530. An act authorizing the procuring of additional land for the enlargement of the site for the public building at Kalamazoo, Mich.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

S. 5773. An act to provide a site and buildings for the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce and Labor—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 16954. An act providing for the reappraisement of certain suburban lots in the town site of Port Angeles, Wash.; and

H. R. 14508. An act permitting the building of dams across the north and south branches of Rock River, adjacent to Vandruffs Island and Carrs Island, and across the cut-off between said islands, in Rock Island County, Ill., in aid of navigation and for the development of water power.

PERSONAL REQUESTS.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LONGWORTH, for one week, on account of important business.

By unanimous consent, Mr. FIELD was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of important business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

THE ZEBULON MONTGOMERY PIKE MONUMENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. TELLER. From the Committee on Finance I report back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 13783) to grant souvenir medallions for the Zebulon Montgomery Pike Monument Association. It is purely a local matter, and I ask that the bill may be put on its passage. The amendment is as to the date. The bill has the favorable report of the Department.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 2, on page 2, line 14, to strike out "May" and insert "August," so as to read:

That the material from which said proposed medallions are to be made shall be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury on or before the 1st day of August, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 53) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to receive for instruction at the Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Daniel Caballero and Andres Cardenas, of Peru; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500 for completing the paving of Florida avenue from Eighteenth street to Connecticut avenue, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for grading and improving Eighteenth street from Minnesota avenue to Harrison street, Anacostia, D. C., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RAILROAD RATE BILL.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PROPOSED METROPOLITAN POLICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send a resolution to the desk and ask that it be read and lie over under the rule.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to investigate the circumstances of the arrest in the city of Washington, January 4, 1906, by the Metropolitan police of Mrs. Minor Morris, and her carriage, attended by indignity and cruelty, through the grounds and basement of one of the public buildings and thence, after being thrown violently into a cab, to the house of detention, and her incarceration for four hours on a charge of disorderly conduct, and later of insanity;

And also to investigate the manner and result of an inquiry made by Maj. Richard Sylvester, superintendent of the Metropolitan police, into the facts of the case; and to inquire whether said investigation was fair and unprejudiced and all the impartial and available witnesses examined;

Whether said superintendent undertook to make an investigation by the use of detectives and secret-service men concerning the previous life and reputation of Mrs. Morris;

Whether he procured and made use of a statement of one H. B. Weaver, M. D., who falsely pretended that Mrs. Morris had been a patient of his in Asheville, N. C., two years ago;

Whether there is any police regulation in the city of Washington which requires that any person arrested shall not be released until taken to police headquarters and there detained until a police inquiry is instituted and ended;

And especially to inquire whether the said superintendent of police and one of the chief witnesses against Mrs. Morris have since received recognition by the appointment of near relatives to office; and whether any laws should be adopted by Congress for the better regulation and improvement of the police force of the city of Washington.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie over.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that there may be printed in pamphlet form the amendments which have been proposed to the railroad-rate bill. I ask that the amendments may be printed in the order of the sections of the bill—that is, in the order in which they will be taken up under the unanimous-consent agreement for consideration. I think it would be a great convenience to Senators to have all the amendments in one compact form.

Mr. ALLISON. In bill form?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; in pamphlet form, printed all together. They will be printed from the bill print. I mean only to put them in pamphlet form.

Mr. ALLISON. In bill size?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest to the Senator that probably some of them do not refer to any specific section, and those could be printed, I suppose, at the end.

Mr. LODGE. At the end, where there is no specific section referred to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. TILLMAN. I suggest to the Senator that if they are printed in the form in which they have been offered with lines and all that, it would be much easier for us to keep tab on them to have them bound in the form in which they are already printed.

Mr. LODGE. They can be bound in that form. It will answer every purpose. My only desire is to get them together in a form like that.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator accept as an amendment that they shall be bound together?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; bound together.

Mr. TILLMAN. There is no need of any more printing of the amendments.

Mr. LODGE. There are plenty of copies, and they can be bound together in the form in which they are now, and in the order in which they would be considered—that is, in the order of the sections.

Mr. TILLMAN. Some of them make no reference to sections.

Mr. LODGE. All those would come at the end.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was going to suggest that it might be better to classify them by having those which refer to the court review and nonsuspension provisions in one bunch, and so on down with one subject, and with an index.

Mr. LODGE. That will be done by printing them according to the sections. The court-review amendments would come under one section. I think the arrangement by sections will cover the order of the amendments as well as anything.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no objection to any number of amendments being reprinted if the Senate desires it, but of course there will be no understanding or obligation as to any order of amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; not the least.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senate will be perfectly free to take any course it deems best.

Mr. LODGE. Of course we can not set aside the rules of the Senate. A Senator can offer an amendment at any stage to any part of the bill. But the unanimous-consent agreement was that the bill should be read by sections for the purpose of amendment. I thought it would be a mere matter of convenience to have all the amendments bound together in the order of the sections; I thought it would save us a great deal of trouble; that is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the request of the Senator from Massachusetts to be that the amendments be bound together.

Mr. LODGE. So that each Senator may have a copy for his own use.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts does not ask for a further print?

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not ask for a further print.

Mr. NELSON. Would it not be well to print in that connection the name of the Senator who introduced the amendment?

Mr. LODGE. That appears upon every amendment now. The only proposition is to bind the printed amendments just as they are here.

Mr. BACON. Does that include a copy of the bill to be bound with the amendments?

Mr. LODGE. Substitute bills?

Mr. BACON. The original bill, the House bill.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no.

Mr. BACON. I think that ought to be included. It would be more convenient.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be a great deal better to keep the bill separate.

Mr. BACON. Let it include the bill and substitute bills and the amendments.

Mr. LODGE. I think it would be much better to keep the bill separate from the amendments.

Mr. BACON. I have already had it done in that shape for my own personal convenience, and I find it very convenient to have the bills under the same cover with the amendments. Still, I shall not insist upon it.

Mr. LODGE. It would seem to me to be much more convenient to keep the amendments separate from the bill. We shall all have bills here to follow, of course. Then, if we have the amendments under a separate cover, we can turn to the amendments as they are taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Massachusetts kindly restate his request?

Mr. LODGE. I ask that all amendments which have been offered to the railway rate bill may be bound in pamphlet form, a copy for each Senator, in the order of the sections to which they are offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The order was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, That there be printed and stitched, in bill form, 200 sets of all the amendments proposed to the bill H. R. 12987, "An act to regulate commerce," etc., the arrangement to be in the order of the sections of the bill, and where the amendments, if any, do not designate the section to which they should be attached they are to be placed at the end.

Mr. ALDRICH. While this matter is before the Senate, I desire to see if I understand the order of the Senate made yesterday. I do not understand that the rule as agreed to prevents the presentation and disposition of amendments between now and Friday, if the Senate so orders or so desires.

Mr. BACON. I scarcely think that that suggestion would be consistent with the consent rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. I tried to state yesterday that my understanding was that amendments may be offered in the meantime. There is an amendment now pending offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. I think that amendment could be disposed of, if the Senate so choose, between now and Friday—in other words, there is a special rule for Friday as to the amendments under a limited time for discussion. I do not know of any reason why, if we have time between now and Friday, we may not be able to dispose of some of the amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought I gave notice yesterday evening that the bill would be held before the Senate and we would either begin to vote on some amendments or we had to talk on something connected with it.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my understanding.

Mr. TILLMAN. I expect to stand by that proposition and hope to get a vote on amendments before next Friday. We will certainly have to talk or vote, one or the other.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly I yield to him for a question. I am simply stating my own understanding of the order and I see that the Senator from South Carolina agrees with me in the interpretation of the order. It seems to me clearly the right of anyone to have an amendment disposed of before Friday. I see no particular reason why we should spend two or three days in debate without a vote. I am anxious to get a vote on the bill. I am not so sure that we can not dispose of the whole bill before Friday.

Mr. LODGE. I had supposed that the purpose of the agreement was to give notice to Senators that the voting on the amendments should begin on Friday.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is to be done under the fifteen-minute rule, and it was distinctly understood.

Mr. LODGE. I stated yesterday that I thought there were two points that it was desirable to determine, when we should begin to vote on the amendments and when we should take the final vote on the bill, and I supposed the unanimous-consent agreement was simply to fix a time at which the voting should begin. Of course, if we should begin voting to-day that notice would be of no value.

Mr. BACON. I do not refer now to the RECORD, but my recollection is in accord with what the Senator from Massachusetts has just stated. The agreement which was reached as to what should begin on Friday was in response to the suggestion made by him that it was important that Senators should know on what date voting on amendments would be in order.

Mr. LODGE. That is my understanding, certainly.

Mr. BACON. It was in response to that suggestion that after considerable colloquy between Senators it was so arranged and so agreed, that on Friday we would take up the bill by sections beginning with the first section and proceed with it under the fifteen-minute rule. If that is not a plain and definite agreement to the effect that it shall not be done before then, I am unable to properly construe language.

Furthermore, we all remember what the Senator from South Carolina said as to his purpose to require that the debate should continue or a vote should be called for; but when we reached the unanimous-consent agreement it certainly supplanted that previous expression of intention on his part.

Mr. LODGE. Otherwise the agreement is worthless.

Mr. BACON. It is absolutely worthless unless that is the case; and the Senator from South Carolina himself, by agreeing to it necessarily abandoned his preconceived and expressed determination to proceed with the debate, or in the absence of debate to call for a vote.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator will recall that four or five suggestions were made yesterday afternoon as to what the form of the agreement should be, and that they were all objected to. Finally I declared that I felt it to be my duty to get the bill before the Senate and keep it there, knowing that under the rule there must be debate or a vote would be had. I tried to get an arrangement for a fixed day, but could not. I was notified by the Senator from Texas, who is absent, that two or three Senators had signified their desire to make blanket speeches and they did not want to be limited by the fifteen-minute rule. Therefore I suggested finally that the fifteen-minute rule should begin its operation on Friday, but I did not feel, and I do not feel now, that there was any implied obligation on my part to prevent a vote on any amendment until Friday.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I will ask, with the Senator's permission, this question——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I wish merely to call his attention to what occurred in the debate yesterday evening.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me it is important that all Senators should have due notice of two things—when the final vote is to be taken and when the voting on amendments is to begin. I think there ought to be notice of those two facts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have tried to get an opportunity to do that.

Mr. LODGE. I know the Senator has. I am entirely agreed with his original proposition.

Mr. TILLMAN. I said I tried three or four times—indeed, I tried half a dozen times to get that arrangement made, but never could succeed.

Mr. ALDRICH. The colloquy to which the Senator alludes took place long before the final arrangement was made and before an objection was entered on the part of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon, after the agreement which was made there was no such announced intention on the part of the Senator from South Carolina. On the same page from which the Senator from Massachusetts has just read, after the statement which he has just read, that it was important that Senators should know when the voting on amendments is to begin, the colloquy proceeded, and finally the junior Senator from Texas made this suggestion:

Mr. BAILEY. I believe the Senator from South Carolina can get an agreement that next Friday morning we shall take up this bill, to be read by sections; that as each section is read amendments to that section shall be in order, and that each amendment shall be subject to consideration under the fifteen-minute rule, and when considered shall be disposed of. I believe the Senator can get that.

Mr. FRYE. So do I.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will ask unanimous consent for that.

Therefore this consent was given on the request of the Senator from South Carolina. Then the Secretary read the request:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the request of the Senator from South Carolina for unanimous consent.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me just a moment so I may complete the record.

The Secretary read as follows:

"It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that on Friday, May 4, 1906, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 12987, the bill to be read by sections for the purpose of amendment, the discussion upon amendments to proceed under the fifteen-minute rule"——

Mr. TILLMAN. And amendments to be disposed of when the discussion closes.

The Secretary read as follows:

"The amendments to be disposed of when the discussion thereon is concluded."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Then there was colloquy by Messrs. ALLISON, TELLER, MORGAN, and TILLMAN as to the time. Finally the Vice-President asked the question:

Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Now, I want simply to say to the Senator from South Carolina, with his permission, that if instead of an agreement to take up amendments on that day and vote the agreement had been to take up the bill on that day and vote, certainly the Senator would not contend that in the interim if debate failed the vote could be demanded by him. As to this agreement there was no suggestion by him that it was his purpose to keep the bill before the Senate and call for a vote if debate failed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator contend that if debate should be exhausted between now and Friday the Senate would be precluded by this arrangement from taking a vote?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly. Otherwise the agreement means nothing. It very frequently happens, as the Senator will certainly recall, that when the Senate has made an agreement to vote on a certain day at a certain hour, debate would cease before that time and other business was taken up to occupy the interval, and the Senate carried out its original unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALDRICH. This is not an agreement to vote on the bill at a certain hour. This is simply an agreement to limit debate with a certain limitation; that is all. It is no agreement to vote at any time, but simply an agreement that debate shall be limited under the fifteen-minute rule.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. ALDRICH. We can vote Friday or any other day on the whole bill and the amendments. I do not see why we should spend three or four days without voting upon amendments.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Georgia let me try to disentangle this matter?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want to say there is no need for looking down the road to meet trouble until it gets here. And now I want to get my skirts clear. I want to renew the request for a day to be fixed when we can get a vote, and if I can get that I will very readily and gladly yield to the Senator's contention as to what he says has been already agreed to, because I do not myself feel that it is altogether just to absent Senators not to give them time to get here and participate in the running debate under the fifteen-minute rule, and also in voting on the amendments.

Now, I renew the request which I made yesterday afternoon, that on Thursday, the 10th, at 2 o'clock, the debate on the bill and on amendments then pending shall be concluded; that we will then take up the bill and vote on it and complete it before we adjourn that night.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think he should make that request in the absence of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]? The Senator from Alabama objected to that request yesterday, and I observe that he is not in his seat.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then, I withdraw it until the Senator from Alabama comes in. I ask that the bill be laid before the Senate. I understand the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] wants to speak upon it, and also the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks unanimous consent——

Mr. PENROSE. I understand that the morning business is not over.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania to introduce a bill.

[The bills introduced by Mr. PENROSE appear under their appropriate heading.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE subsequently said: I wish to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina or the Chair, and that is whether the question which was under discussion as to whether there could be a vote before the day named in the unanimous-consent agreement has been determined?

Mr. TILLMAN. It has not. It just dropped out of sight for the moment.

DISBURSING OFFICERS' CHECKS.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5811) to amend section 3646 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885, as amended by act of March 23, 1906, to report it favorably without amendment. The bill is to correct an error in a bill which passed both Houses a few days since and became a law. It is sent here from the Treasury Department. It is in regard to issuing duplicate checks in case of lost checks, and it is important that it should be passed immediately, in view of certain complications at the Treasury Department which have grown out of the passage of the former bill. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by act of February 16, 1885, as amended by act of March 23, 1906, by striking out the words "check or warrant" wherever the words appear in the amended act, and by substituting in lieu thereof the words "disbursing officer's check."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 15334. An act to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Coosa River at Lock 2, Alabama, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO GEN. HORACE PORTER.

H. J. Res. 149. Joint resolution extending the thanks of Congress to Gen. Horace Porter was read the first time by its title.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of the people of the United States are justly due and are hereby tendered to Gen. Horace Porter, late ambassador to France, for his disinterested and patriotic services in conducting, upon his own initiative and at his own expense, a series of researches and excavations extending over a period of six years and resulting in the recovery of the body of Admiral John Paul Jones from a forgotten grave in a foreign land and its return to the country which he had loved so well and so heroically served.

Resolved, That General Porter be requested to furnish Congress a copy of his remarks at the exercises at Annapolis, April 26, 1906, and that, when received, said remarks be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the joint resolution come from any committee?

Mr. LODGE. It has just come from the House. It is a resolution of thanks and passed the House without reference to a committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LODGE. It does not seem to me worth while to be so particular when you are trying to be courteous. But still, if the Senator insists——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not insist on a reference. Much of the value of this measure as a compliment depends upon the cordiality and freedom from anything like hesitation with which it is extended. I am sure there will not be a Senator on that committee or in this Chamber who would not cordially give his support to the joint resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not objecting to it or suggesting the reference with an idea of being discourteous to General Porter.

Mr. BACON. Not at all. I have not suggested that.

Mr. ALDRICH. But we are establishing what seems to me is rather a dangerous precedent. If every man who does a good thing for the country in a diplomatic capacity is to receive the thanks of Congress, I would say that it might become quite an abuse. If that is to be the custom to be established here, I should regret it very much. I say that very frankly.

Mr. BACON. We should all agree to that.

Mr. ALDRICH. The thanks of Congress have been extended in the past to great generals and to great admirals, so that it has been really a distinction worth having.

Mr. LODGE. The thanks of Congress have also been extended to great inventors.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; to great inventors in one or two cases long ago. If we are to recognize every duty performed in a manly way by every officer of the United States in a diplomatic capacity by extending to him the thanks of Congress, and if it is to be thought ungenerous or discourteous to suggest that resolutions for that purpose be referred to a committee, then I think I shall have to assume the position of being discourteous about it, because I think it would be establishing a very dangerous precedent, which we ought not to establish.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, there has been no suggestion of discourtesy.

Mr. ALDRICH. Such action simply cheapens the thanks of Congress to the extent to which I am unwilling to go.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not think that extending the thanks of Congress in this instance would in any degree cheapen that recognition of worthy conduct. The Senator from Rhode Island, I think, need be under no such apprehension. There has been nothing in the past to indicate any disposition on the part of Congress to extend this very high compliment to any except those who most richly merit it.

I am surprised that there should be a suggestion that this service is of such an ordinary character that to extend this recognition to it would cheapen that compliment when such recognition shall hereafter be bestowed upon others. It is not correct, Mr. President, to state that this is simply a duty performed by an ambassador. This was entirely outside of his ambassadorial functions or outside of any duty devolved upon him as an ambassador. It was a duty undertaken by him, it is true, when he had the advantage of official position, which gave him opportunities a private citizen might not have enjoyed; but it is none the less to his credit that, moved by the highest impulse of patriotism, he undertook this most worthy work and persevered in it under circumstances which would have discouraged almost any other man; that he not only did so through a period of years, but that he did it at his own expense, and absolutely, when there was an offer to return him the money, he declined to receive it. This most valuable result, one which appeals to the patriotism of every man and every woman and every child in the land, is one which richly merits recognition on the part of Congress.

The only suggestion I made to the Senator was, not that there was any discourtesy, but that, in a matter which must, I presume, command the support of every Senator, it was something of value that the compliment be extended in a way that there should not be attached to it the slightest manifestation of hesitation on the part of the Senate of the United States.

I seriously regret that the Senator from Rhode Island takes the view of it that he does, because it would be to me personally and as a Senator a most gratifying thing that I could join in this expression of very high appreciation on the part of the American Republic of this most notable performance by this most worthy representative of the Government at the court of France.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution which has been read?

Mr. CULLOM. Allow me to say a word, Mr. President.

I do not understand whether the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] has withdrawn his motion to refer.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not yet done so.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will do so. If he does not, however, I desire that the joint resolution shall be referred without any long discussion in reference to it. It seems to me it would be much better to either pass the joint resolution without discussion or to refer it, and let it be reported back in some shape by the committee. Either one of those two things should be done without delay.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I made the request for unanimous consent, I confess it never occurred to me that it was a matter as to which there would be the slightest objection. I wish to say one word in explanation.

The joint resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives and passed there without reference to a committee, as I understand. It came over to us in that way, without going through the usual form. The service General Porter performed was not an official service. It was entirely apart from that; it was a personal service. It seems to me if Congress is going to extend the compliment of thanks—and the thanks of Congress are a very high compliment indeed—this is the only manner in which we can recognize what General Porter has done. It only seemed to me that if we were going to do it and wanted to do it, we should do it in the most generous and gracious manner possible. I had no thought that anybody would make the slightest objection, or I should not have made the request. To have discussion over it seems to me very unfortunate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I myself do not think that there is any impropriety in referring the joint resolution to a committee. I do not think such a reference would in the slightest degree detract from the importance and the value of the compliment. There have been very few men in the history of this country who have had such an honor conferred upon them; and if it is done with deliberation, as it will be if the joint resolution goes to a committee and is reported to the Senate, it certainly can not detract from the value of our action.

I think, as a matter of propriety, all resolutions of this character should go to a committee. I can understand very readily that in times of excitement a resolution of this kind might be introduced and passed through one body or the other, without there being proper ground for it. Of course this is a case in which there is not any controversy; and, therefore, I think it affords a good opportunity for us to establish a rule, and to stand by it in the future, that we will not confer such an honor upon anybody in a mere perfunctory manner or in haste. I think no Senator should object to the joint resolution going to a committee, and the committee then reporting it in proper form.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course one objection carries the joint resolution to a committee; but I withdraw the request for unanimous consent, and regret extremely that discussion should have taken place upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CONGRESSIONAL AID FOR CALIFORNIA SUFFERERS.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to yield to me for a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations a few days ago, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] called attention to the fact that in certain newspapers in the country it had been stated that of the $2,500,000 appropriated by Congress for the relief of the people of San Francisco, only $300,000 was available. It occurred to me at the time that the people would understand the matter and that there would be no danger of an impression getting into the minds of the public that the money appropriated so generously by Congress had not been properly expended. Since that time I have noticed in two of the great newspapers of New England, as well as in some newspapers published in other parts of the country, large headlines repeating the statement that only $300,000 of the two million and a half was available for the relief of the people of that stricken city.

Mr. President, we all know that every dollar of that money has been or will be properly expended; but for the purpose of correcting what I think is an impression that has gained credence to a very considerable extent in the country, I should like to have the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON] state to the Senate and the country precisely what disposition has been made of that money.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, by the terms of the joint resolutions the two appropriations made by Congress for the benefit of the sufferers at San Francisco were to be expended by the Secretary of War. It is well known to Senators that when this great calamity occurred the Secretary of War immediately, without legislation, proceeded to transfer to San Francisco all the available means of the War Department, including quartermaster stores, tents, bedding, blankets, and everything that was available within five hundred or a thousand miles of San Francisco. He took that responsibility, believing that Congress would reimburse the War Department for that expenditure. Within a day or two the joint resolution appropriating $1,000,000 passed; but at the time of the passage of that joint resolution the War Department had already forwarded commissary, quartermaster, medical stores, etc., in excess of the appropriation, amounting, I believe, to $1,200,000 or perhaps $1,300,000. I have not the details before me. So another million and a half dollars was asked for a like purpose. That amount was promptly appropriated by Congress.

This calamity occurred in the very last quarter of the fiscal year, when the appropriations for medical and commissary stores, transportation, etc., are nearly all expended. Therefore it became necessary for the maintenance of our Army that these expenditures made for the supplies and stores of the Army should be refunded, so that the second appropriation, providing that the expenditures already made and to be incurred should be reimbursed to the funds of the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Medical Corps of the Army. That evidently meant that the two and a half million dollars were to be expended for the benefit of the stricken people of San Francisco. But when that money was expended out of stores already in existence, pro tanto those stores were to be returned, in order that the Army itself might be enabled to live between now and the 1st of July. I understand there is now left about a half million dollars of those funds.

There ought not to be any doubt in the country on this subject, and I hope there will not be, as I am quite sure, if further money is needed, it will be promptly appropriated by Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Before the Senator takes his seat, I wish to say that I am glad that this explanation has been made, because the Senator will recall the fact that I directed attention to it in the Committee on Appropriations yesterday, when I suggested that the country did not understand it and that some explanation ought to be made regarding it. I have been told, and the Senator has just told the Senate, that this two and a half million dollars has been mainly used to replace the supplies which the War Department of its own volition and on its own motion had already forwarded to San Francisco before Congress made the appropriation and that, therefore, in buying the Government supplies to replace those which had been sent to San Francisco they had to take this money.

I should like to ask the Senator now if his information from the War Department is to the effect that any of this money will go for tents or things like that? For instance, I presume that this Government is ready to loan, or to give, if need be, tents to the sufferers of one kind and another from Mississippi floods, etc., its supplies of that kind free of cost, and I want to know of the Senator whether any of this money will be used to buy back for the Government the tents which have been sent to San Francisco for temporary use by the people there?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, as respects the special article of tents, I have not any information as to what particular disposition has been made of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. They will probably be returned.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; eventually they will probably be returned, though perhaps they will not be returned for some time.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was not speaking about the return. I was speaking of whether any of the money will be used to purchase new tents to supply the deficit created by the lending of those tents.

Mr. ALLISON. I say again I can not answer that question; but that is mere leather and prunella, aside from the great expenditures that have been made. The tents will cost $100,000 or $150,000.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was just going to remark——

Mr. ALLISON. I want to say to the Senator, although I am sure he knows it himself, that every dollar of this money will be accounted for in detail as respects——

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not the slightest idea to the contrary.

Mr. ALLISON. As respects the expenditures and also the disbursements.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have never had any suspicion to the contrary. I was merely trying to have an explanation made to the country as to why there was an apparent misappropriation or misuse of this money.

Mr. ALLISON. It ought to be said that the city of San Francisco and the surrounding towns will receive directly and indirectly every dollar of this expenditure. It is an absolute gift in this calamity to the stricken people who have suffered such great loss. The War Department will be reimbursed, so far as practicable, from the stores which they have taken there and which are already in use or will soon be in process of use.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was merely trying to make clear my own opinion that, if any of this money had been used to reimburse the War Department for tents and things of that character, we ought to instruct the officers of the Government to the contrary; and let them know that we want the sufferers to use our tents—at least I do—and, if necessary, to wear them out and never return them. Let us make it plain that we ought not to take the two and a half million dollars to replace the tents we have loaned.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire, Mr. President, to supplement what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. ALLISON] has said, and perhaps my explanation will satisfy my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. Immediately after the wires had flashed the news across the continent of the great calamity that had befallen San Francisco and other cities in California, I placed myself in communication with the Secretary of War. Congress had then taken no action whatever in relation to the matter, neither House being then in session. The Secretary of War said, "Anything in my control, although not authorized by law to do so, shall be placed at the disposal of the distressed and homeless people of San Francisco." At that time my information was that 150,000 people were homeless, destitute, and without food.

I want to say in passing that the Secretary of War, the Commissary-General, the Quartermaster-General, the Military Secretary, and, indeed, all other officers of the Government in the War Department, as well as in the Navy and other Departments, vied with each other to do all they could to relieve the distress of those people. The Secretary of War remained in his office during the Sabbath day, giving his personal attention to matters of relief and directing, inditing, and dictating telegrams and other communications to the general in command in San Francisco and other officers of the Government.

I have, however, seen it stated in the newspapers referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] that part of the money appropriated by Congress has not been directed in the channels in which it was intended by Congress to go. Therefore this morning I placed myself in communication with Major-General Ainsworth, the Military Secretary, and, after consultation with the Secretary of War relative to the matter, the Secretary of War decided to send a communication to the chairman of the relief committee in San Francisco, ex-Mayor James D. Phelan. I have a copy of that dispatch, Mr. President, and I will ask the permission of the Senate that the Secretary may read it. It explains the full situation and the status of the appropriations made by Congress for the relief of the people of California.

I merely wish to add that the magnificent generosity not only of Congress, but of the people throughout our country, has excited the admiration and gratitude of the people of California, as well as of others who have an interest in and love for their fellow-beings.

I now ask that the Secretary read the communication of the Secretary of War. I think it will explain the situation fully and to the satisfaction of my friend from South Carolina.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 1, 1906.

JAMES D. PHELAN,
Chairman of Relief Committee and Red Cross, San Francisco:

You and your committee evidently misconceive the nature and legal limitations of the Congressional aid and do not understand the facts. Instantly on receipt of General Funston's telegram of the extent of the disaster and the pressing need of food and shelter for more than 100,000 people, although I was without lawful authority to do so, I ordered sent to San Francisco rations costing $200,000; tentage, blankets, cots, and bedding costing more than a million dollars, and medical stores costing $150,000 to be used and distributed for the relief of the sufferers.

The transportation of these supplies cost more than $150,000. I made this order anticipating that Congress would ratify my action. Congress did so by joint resolution authorizing me to furnish subsistence, quartermaster, and medical stores for relief of the sufferers and appropriated a million dollars for these purposes to be used in my discretion. The President then advised Congress that expenses had already been incurred for these purposes aggregating one million and a half of dollars and recommended the appropriation of one million and a half more, or two millions and a half in all. Congress thereupon increased the appropriation to two millions and a half in all and authorized me to use this amount not only for subsistence, quartermaster, and medical stores, but also for the transportation of troops. On the recommendation of General Greely and Mayor Schmitz I ordered twenty-five hundred more troops to San Francisco, which, with previous transportation for same purpose, involves an expense of $250,000. There is left available of the appropriation, therefore, not to exceed $700,000, which under the law can only be expended for rations, quartermaster and medical supplies, and transportation of troops, and which can only be expended through the lawful agents of the War Department, to wit, the bonded officers of the subsistence, quartermaster, and medical bureaus under my direction. I have no power or legal authority to turn over the money appropriated by Congress to your committee to be expended by you or to expend it for any but the specific purposes stated in the Congressional resolutions. Should you think that the supply of rations or quartermaster stores or medical supplies ought to be increased, I shall be glad to direct the purchase and forwarding of them to the proper Army officers in San Francisco for distribution, but I can not order the payment of money out of the Treasury of the United States to your committee for any purpose. My discretion is to be exercised only as to the amounts to be expended for the specific purposes mentioned in the Congressional resolutions and is thus limited by law. As president of the Red Cross Society, I have already directed the remittance to you by telegram of $300,000 out of the funds of that society and am prepared to order the remittance of more as you shall need it.

It will aid us in taking proper action if you will advise me of the amount of money you have on hand and in general the purposes for which you need more. I infer from your telegrams that you now have on hand food supplies, tentage, blankets, and clothing enough for present needs.

WM. H. TAFT.
Secretary of War and President of Red Cross.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to make a request?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that an additional print may be had of all the amendments offered to the railroad rate bill. There are not enough to make the sets that were ordered this morning for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that additional copies of the amendments pending to the railroad rate bill be printed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senate confronts the greatest economic problem of this age, and, I may add, of any age. As the railroad system of the United States is the mightiest framework of commercial organization that the world has ever known, so it presents problems more diverse, more interesting, and more practical than ever have before challenged the mind of man. More complex and not less important than the tariff, these problems exact patience and conjure the highest faculties of research and understanding. However simple they may seem to the casual onlooker or auditor, to those who have studied them they grow in reach and width and depth and complication with every progressive step of inquiry, and the honest mind that seeks to compass them must be profoundly impressed, if not overweighed, by the limitations of knowledge and by the perplexities of irregular conditions and countervailing influences—geographical, financial, social, political, juridical, and economic.

A NEW PROBLEM.

This problem is unlike either the currency or the tariff, in the fact that it is a new problem. The currency and the tariff are old customers. Like the poor, they have been with us, and they will be with us always. This is a new face at the Congressional door, a young stranger, I may say, knocking for admission, and surely coming in, whether one political party or another says "not in" to the knocker. It is a child of the nineteenth century, and it is one of its rapid and gigantic growths. No one could or did forecast the destiny of this child when it was born and lay in its crude cradle. No one discerned the signs of royalty on its infantile brow. We know now that it was an infant Hercules; Hercules has grown to full statue and wields a club as big as many big sticks, pitchforks, and muck rakes bound together like the Roman fasces. Hercules is rich, too, and of near kin to Midas; so rich that in comparison Crœsus and Monte Cristo are faded specters and Plutus has his rival.

Transportation between the States and foreign nations and the regulation thereof—that is the broad significance of this problem.

It divides itself naturally into the discussion of law and the discussion of facts. We must consider the law first, and must then seek to apply and adjust it to the facts, for here, so to speak, we are in a sense judges and also jurors, and must determine both the law and the facts in so far as they enter into our consideration.

THE SCIENCE OF MOVEMENT.

This problem of transportation is a fundamental problem of the human race. Edward Atkinson has an expression on this subject that arrested my attention when I first saw it. It is a sententious utterance: "Man can create nothing; he can only move something." Out of this window of thought flashes a great light. Man can not even create so much as a mote that floats in the air. His mission is movement—movement of himself, movement of others, movement of thought, and movement of things of matter which do unto him pertain.

Things of the vegetable creation can not move themselves. A tree stays where it takes root, and there may remain while generations and centuries pass by. The grass withereth where it springs in fixed localities; but the winds bear the seeds of the tree and the plant hither and thither as they listeth, and fruits grow where the autonomy of natural forces plants them.

Animated creatures were created to move themselves, some over the earth, some in the waters under the earth, some in the air above the earth. But man, by the contrivances of nature and of his creative genius, moves everywhere, over land and over sea, and he penetrates even the kingdom of the air with his tentative designs and contemplations, which give omen and partial assurance of his yet undeveloped powers and foretoken his achievements in regions just dawning within the range of his ambitious thought.

THE SHIP AND THE ROAD.

Man not only moves his own body by the exercise of its limbs, but also by the subjection of the creatures of the land to his uses. The camel, the ox, the horse, the ass bear him and his burdens as he ordains. Turning the woods of the forest into the implements of convenience, he makes the ocean, the lake, the river the common highway of his movements, and turning them, too, into appliances for the land, he hardens those appliances with metal taken from the mines and wheels over its surface. To his vehicle he sometimes attaches his fellows, sometimes a four-footed captive of the animal kingdom, and whatever force he collects he appropriates to his own use and purposes.

The ship and the road—these have been the greatest of all the instrumentalities of man for the convenience and development of his own movements. The great nations have been those who recognize and who perfect the utility of their uses. Behold a nation that has ships in plenty and good roads, and you will behold a nation that has seized time by the forelock and taken methods of advancement by the right handle. It is the science of movement that we are to consider in our interstate relations, and the time is ripe for action.

DELAY IN DEALING WITH THE SUBJECT.

Prof. Arthur T. Hadley, instructor in political economy at Yale and commissioner of labor statistics of Connecticut, is a man of learning and of weight. No one who has read his book on railroad transportation is likely to attribute to him the disposition of the iconoclast. I commend the things which he says which go to explain why Congress did not earlier take up this subject.

In 1860 a storm burst in this country, a storm that had collected through many centuries, and lay at the deep root of long conditions of human affairs. At that time an American citizen eligible to the Senate—that is, 30 years old—was just about the age of our then railroad system, for on the Fourth of July, 1828, Charles Carroll of Carrollton laid the first rail of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. He was the last signer of the Declaration of Independence, and his passing from the scene in the third decade of the nineteenth century marked the beginning of the new era of transportation. But while this new era was dawning, clouds were also gathering over the people of this country. Their thoughts were so surcharged with present things that their concentration on things economical was in a degree diverted. But the earlier railroad movements of this country, Mr. President, were initiated by the States and not by the Federal Government, and it is natural that the States should have matured systems of public control earlier than the Federal Government has done so. Now, the railroad system has grown and overspread the country ere we have undertaken in any comprehensive way to regulate it.

A NATIONAL AND WORLD-WIDE PROBLEM.

This question has important local aspects; but it is not a local, but a wide, embracing subject in the phases which it presents to us, although it involves the fortunes of many localities and of many persons. It is not a State problem in the immediate view of this bill, though the fact underlies it that the States compose the nation, and that they possess connecting problems of their own which come to a focus in the central national power. It is preeminently, however, a national problem—one that concerns the whole people of the United States, both in the aggregate and in the severalties of their communal and individual parts.

But more than this, it is not only as broad as the country; it stretches beyond the ocean, through the necessities, through the vehicles, through the contacts, through the exchanges, the reciprocities and the affinities of trade and commerce, and its lines in verity run out to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Antedating the railroad system of the world lie six thousand years of history and the countless ages of prehistoric times. Before the steam engine was invented and before the iron rail was laid, civilization had overspread the earth in the older continents and had appeared and made wonderful advancement in our own country. Great cities had been builded. Immense ports and harbors had been constructed. Ships had circumnavigated the globe, and nations had risen and fallen. Peoples and languages had come and gone, and great masses of capital in money and other properties had been invested in many of the perfected works and establishments of man.

DISTURBING AND IMPEDING ELEMENTS IN THE PROBLEMS PRESENTED.

When a new system was thus interjected into and made to overlay an old one, it is obvious that disturbing factors would immediately present themselves to the harmony and to the equitable conduct of it according to idealistic views. I will point out briefly ere I discuss the question some of these disturbing factors which reveal themselves as soon as one undertakes to solve any of the given problems which are presented to us, any one of which it would take a master mind to discuss thoroughly, and a long essay to explain to other minds.

Some of these disturbing factors may in some degree be of a permanent nature. They are certainly of an existent nature. They must be noted and they must be weighed by every fair mind that seeks to understand the causations of rates which do not take the distance traversed in the transportation of passengers and freight as a standard of the principle of price for carriage. Some of them are these: First, the distant and established markets of foreign nations—Liverpool, for instance. Unless the wheat of the Northwest and other surplus farm products of our country can reach and have a competitive part in the Liverpool market, a great amount of our own trade would be curtailed and immense material crowded back upon us. This has led to discriminating practices with respect to our foreign commerce which at the first blush strike the mind as exceedingly unjust and which may need the processes of correction. The result, however, of this condition is a substantial fact existing in the nature of civilization. So it has come to pass that less rates are charged to-day for delivery of wheat in the Liverpool market than for its delivery in the city of New York.

Then, again, Mr. President, the seas and the oceans which connect us with all foreign nations, from our western and from our eastern shores, are in themselves the causation of great currents of traffic and travel, and then these waterways constitute in themselves a free road connecting all the seashore nations. Another disturbing factor is found in our own rivers, lakes, and canals, the internal navigable waters of our own country. We have developed these waters by immense appropriations. We have shaped, constructed, or improved their channels for the convenience of our own people, and the result is that oftentimes a longer route between two points furnishes cheaper transportation by a water course than shorter routes by rail, and railroads are put under conditions which it is difficult for the most philosophic and the most equitable mind to treat with justice and with due regard to all the conflicting interests which are involved.

So, Mr. President, the seaports and the harbors of this country and the seaports and the harbors of other countries which are at varied distances from the initial point of transportation or to the terminal points are in themselves diverting and sometimes most imperious causes of great systems of traffic and differentials in rates.

Look at the great American seaports—Boston, Baltimore, New York, Philadelphia, Norfolk, Newport News, Wilmington, Savannah, Charleston, New Orleans, Tampa, Galveston. How much money have the whole people of the United States expended upon them? How have the light-houses risen at popular cost to guide the mariner? How have the harbors been dredged and dug out? How have all the improvements of art and constructive genius been applied to them?

Moreover, Mr. President, a harbor is like a mountain pass. Nature originated it, and a harbor is in a certain sense a general and a pervasive public possession and convenience.

Then again, Mr. President, comes the competitive force of rival railroad lines at varied distances from important initial and terminal points, introducing the perplexities and the variants of active and constant competition.

Then, Mr. President, arise practices which have grown in a measure out of irregular conditions—the grouping of a number of cities and of large sections within prescribed distances from initial or terminal points on one basis of charge for travel or traffic. This is what railroad men call the "basic system."

Then, Mr. President, man is a gregarious animal. It has been the habit of the human race since they commenced their journey through this world to collect together in tribes, societies, and organizations of all kinds, to build habitations and cities by systems, sometimes demanded by necessities of defense. Out of the social nature of man have grown great centers of manufacturing, of mining, or agricultural produce, of education, of art, and great emporiums of commerce which supply enormous bulks of traffic that can and do obtain carriage at wholesale rates, while retail rates are charged communities which supply less material for carriage.

I have not time, in the space that I shall endeavor to occupy the attention of the Senate, to discuss fully the nature of any of these variant and diversified causations that are constant qualities in determining the rates of traffic. I have suggested them, to begin with, that I may bring to the realization of the minds of those who have not pondered how complex, how intricate, how irregular these problems are, and how impossible in the nature of the case it is for the wit or the wisdom of man to provide at this stage of our railroad and social development any perfected code which will reach all evils or will harmonize the whole system in accordance with any perfected theory of human action.

LEADING QUESTIONS.

I shall now turn, Mr. President, to discuss a few of the practical questions which are before us. Has the Congress of the United States been invested by the Constitution with power to regulate passenger and freight charges in transportation from State to State?

Does the power to regulate passenger and freight charges include the power in Congress to fix the identical rate at which a passenger or a certain weight of freight may be carried from State to State?

Does the power of Congress include the right to fix passenger and freight rates from any station or any place in one State to any other station in another State, or is it confined to fixing the rates of carriage simply across a State line?

Has Congress the power to declare the principles upon which rates shall be fixed, and then by statute to enforce compliance with such principles on the part of the transportation companies which conduct the transportation?

Can Congress authorize a commission to ascertain and fix reasonable and just rates for the carriage of passengers and freight from State to State in compliance with the principles which it has defined by law?

Can Congress authorize a commission to enforce compliance or through the courts to seek compliance by transportation companies with the rates fixed by the Commission in accordance with the principles which it has declared by law?

To each and every one of these questions my mind readily yields an affirmative response, and to my reading the position which those answers assume is abundantly sustained by the decisions of both the State and Federal courts of this country, and by consensus of opinion on the part of the great majority of lawyers and publicists who have studied them. Indeed, Mr. President, the affirmation of these doctrines is so intrenched in American jurisprudence by the concurrence of judicial and scholarly minds and by popular acceptation that persistence in disputing any of them seems rather to flow from the egotism, from the pride, or from the enthusiasm of individual opinion or from inflamed passion of interested motive than from any fairly grounded hope or expectation that they will ever be reversed.

It is highly important, however, that the public mind be rightly informed on this subject, that it should understand the juridical status of these questions, and that our own minds should contemplate the situation from the status in which judicial decision has placed it, whether that status be one altogether pleasing to us or no. These are the reasons that actuate me in reviewing some of the ground which has already been so well occupied by others, whose profound researches and whose enlightening expositions have made this debate memorable for its display of intellectual faculties and of legal lore.

FAIR CONSTRUCTION OF THE CONSTITUTION, RATHER THAN REFINED AND METAPHYSICAL REASONING.

Certain other questions besides these are in the public mind and have become practical here. But for the present I will pass them by to discuss those which are fundamental.

Chief Justice Marshall uttered these words in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, which was decided in 1824. That case fills 240 pages of the ninth volume of Wheaton's Reports, and it seems applicable to the strenuous refinings and contractions of Congressional power which I have heard here and there in the debate made upon this floor. He said:

> Powerful and ingenious minds, taking, as postulates, that the powers expressly granted to the Government of the Union are to be contracted by construction into the narrowest possible compass and that the original powers of the States are retained, if any possible construction will retain them, may, by a course of well-digested but refined and metaphysical reasoning, founded on these premises, explain away the Constitution of our country and leave it a magnificent structure indeed to look at, but totally unfit for use.
> They may so entangle and perplex the understanding as to obscure principles which were before thought quite plain and induce doubts where, if the mind were to pursue its own course, none would be perceived. In such a case it is peculiarly necessary to recur to safe and fundamental principles to sustain those principles, and, when sustained, to make them the tests of the arguments to be examined. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 222; A. D. 1824.)

THE CONGRESSIONAL POWER TO REGULATE COMMERCE IS SPECIFIC, COMPLETE, AND COMPREHENSIVE.

Indeed, Mr. President, when we take up the Constitution, these refinements and perplexities which infest a few minds disappear before a fair and natural construction of the language employed, especially when considered with reference to the history of States and Territories. The power of Congress to regulate commerce was not conferred in any meager fashion by the Constitution of the United States. "Regulate" is a word of sovereignty; it is an imperial, a kingly word, as comprehensive as "sovereignty." It was uttered by the voice of the whole people of the United States, and it is as comprehensive as either sovereignty over the land which we inhabit and over every person and everything which pertain thereto. "God said Let there be light; and there was light." This phrase is a little briefer than that in which the people have conferred their sovereign powers upon Congress; but there is nothing meager in the one phrase more than in the other. The one applies to that creative power above us all which made that light, which he who has eyes to see let him see. The other applies to that creative and necessary power of human government which, originating in the sovereign people, was transferred by them to Congress as their servants. To these servants the people gave all of their sovereign power to regulate all of their concerns of commerce among the States. And what is "regulate?" It is "to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed." "This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than prescribed in the Constitution." So says Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheaton, 196).

It is a dangerous power indeed. All power is dangerous, for all power may be abused. Nevertheless, it must exist, and it does exist, and it is for us, as we may, to use it wisely, in so far as it has been committed to our hands for use. It is a sweeping and it is an all-comprehending power. Necessity and propriety are its only limitations; for Congress is given power also "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers"—that is, those that had been enumerated. (Art. I, sec. 8.)

In ascertaining the sense in which the word "necessary" is used in this clause of the Constitution, we look also to that with which it is associated. The only possible fact it has to qualify its strict and rigorous meaning and to present to the mind an idea of some choice of means of legislation is straightened and compressed within the narrow limits of dire necessity.

So arguing, the Supreme Court held that so the end be legitimate and within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited and which consist with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional.

The Supreme Court says also, Judge Brewer giving the opinion, in South Carolina v. U. S., 199 U. S., 448.

The Constitution is a written instrument. As such its meaning does not alter. That which it meant when adopted it means now. Being a grant of powers to a government, its language is general, and as changes come in social and political life, it embraces in its grasp all new conditions which are within the scope of the powers in terms conferred. In other words, while the powers granted do not change, they apply from generation to generation to all things to which they are in their nature applicable. This in no manner abridges the fact of its changeless nature and meaning. Those things which are within its grants of power, as those were understood when made, are still within them, and those things not within them remain still excluded.

Yea, Mr. President, the Constitution in its outlook is like the camera obscura, which has its face always turned toward the front. Constitutions were made solely for the future. If they did not have a forward look, they would be meaningless and vain. Although the thing that the Constitution deals with may not have existed in being, or even in the imagination of man, the moment it comes within the purview of the power extended it enters into and is grasped by the Constitution, exactly like an image which passes before the glass and is reflected on the camera.

ALL NATIONS AND STATES EXERCISE POWER TO REGULATE COMMERCE AND FIX RATES.

There is no nation of this earth to-day, Mr. President, which has any part in the civilization of mankind, certainly none of the advanced nations, that does not assume and exercise the power to regulate railroad traffic and to fix rates. Out of all the forty-five States that compose the American Union there has not been a State which has denied that it possessed this power within the range of its own jurisdiction.

If it were true, as has been eagerly suggested here, that the people of the United States have withheld from Congress the power to fix rates and the power to employ the natural and appropriate administrative agencies to assist them in that work, this would, indeed, be the oddest nation that ever happened in all the tide of time.

It would also be the most impotent nation in its intimate and most important concerns that ever asserted for itself the attributes of sovereignty or that ever flew a flag on land or sea. It would stand forth the most prodigious monument of oddity and helplessness that the wondering world has ever known.

If it be true, Mr. President, that the Constitution of the United States did not intend in conferring power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes," to convey complete and all-embracing power in that sentence, it would seem that those who have been called the "sages of the Revolution" were ignorant persons who little understood the meaning of the words they were using, and that our people have been under delusion in regarding them as wise and far-seeing men.

If it be true that Congress can not fix the principles and confer on executive bodies or commissions the details of examining rate questions and of ascertaining the figures which conform the rates to the principles declared, such doctrine would paralyze government by imposing upon Congress an impossible task and nullifying practical, expedient, natural, and convenient methods by which alone Congressional powers of this description can be properly and fitly exercised.

It is well-nigh inconceivable to my mind that any other mind that is reasonably conversant with human concerns, and that is reasonably fair and righteous in reaching its conclusion, could for a moment dwell upon such nullifying doctrines without perceiving that they are weird, eccentric, destructive, and indeed impossible.

CONGRESSIONAL POWER MUST BE CONFERRED IN MANY CASES ON SUBORDINATE AUTHORITIES.

This Government has been, and now is, and the more and more must be, as populations increase, in the habit of transferring to subordinate authorities and to executive bodies the vast details of its administration, whether that administration refers to the fulfillment of either legislative, executive, or judicial powers.

Congress itself could not accomplish its work unless the executive agents of the two Houses were empowered to buy and sell, to print, to travel, and to do the myriad essential things in execution of the powers of each House or of the Congress which they compose.

Every Cabinet minister and his subordinates must of necessity hear and determine a vast variety of questions which pertain to administration. Our public lands could not be handled. Our rivers and harbors could not be improved for navigation. Our courts could not have commissioners in chancery or receivers. Our armies and navies could neither be organized, clothed, armed, fed, or moved. Our customs and tariff laws would be burdened with dead letters. Our immigration laws and quarantines would be like the Pope's bull against the comet. The Interior and Agricultural Departments would be aliunde. The Pension Bureau would become a nonentity. In short, such a doctrine, generally applied, would be as if the ice age had come again, and the glaciers had taken the place of cities, orchards, and fields, where civilization had been, but was not.

The Congressional power to regulate commerce among the States is "exclusive" as well as complete.

Not only, Mr. President, is this power to regulate commerce all embracing—"complete" and "entire," as the courts express it—it is an exclusive power. No other agency in the United States but Congress and those whom it appoints to administer it can exercise it. The power of the State ends at its boundary line. The power of the United States only ends where the oceans have circumscribed the range of its steam and its sail vessels and where its own immense boundaries meet those of foreign nations.

The Constitution of the United States having given to Congress the power to regulate commerce, not only with foreign nations, but among the several States, that subject is necessarily exclusive whenever the subjects of it are national in their character or admit only of one uniform system or plan of regulation.

So said the Supreme Court, through Judge Bradley, in Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing District (120 U. S., 489–492); and so it repeated, through Judge Brewer, in Atlantic Telegraph Co. v. Philadelphia (190 U. S., 162, 1902).

Out of this power of Congress, Mr. President, rises all the subordinate and fitting powers which are necessary to consummate and to accomplish it. To regulate commerce carries with it the power to build and maintain light-houses, piers, and breakwaters; to employ revenue cutters; to cause surveys to be made of coasts, rivers, and harbors; to appoint all necessary officers at home and abroad, to prescribe their duties, fix their terms of office and compensation; to define and punish all crimes relating to commerce within the sphere of the Constitution.

Any carriage of goods which crosses a State line is interstate commerce; and the fact that transportation from one State to another is accomplished, in whole or in part, through the agency of independent and unrelated carriers up to and from the State line does not affect the character of the transaction in this respect. For whenever an article destined to a place without the State is shipped or started therefor it becomes a subject of interstate commerce, and carriers employed in the transportation thereof, although neither of them may pass from one State to the other, are subjects, as instruments of such commerce, to national legislation and control.

A steamer plying between two points within a State is engaged in commerce between the States so far as she is employed in transporting goods destined for other States. (Daniel Ball (1870), 10 Wall., 557.)

When a part of the route of carriage is on a loop, outside of the State transportation on such route is interstate commerce and not within the power of the State.

Communication by telegraph and telephone is commerce if carried on between the different States, and lies as much within the power of Congressional regulation as the transportation of material things.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE WITH FOREIGN NATIONS, AMONG THE STATES, AND WITH INDIAN TRIBES.

Then, Mr. President, we come to the argument of analogy. The power to regulate commerce is specified in three respects—with foreign nations, among the States, and with Indian tribes. The courts have decided that these are commensurate powers, complete in themselves, exclusive in themselves, and equally comprehensive within themselves. They have also decided that those powers which the States may exercise within their domestic jurisdiction with respect to a regulation of freights and traffic the United States may exercise within the same region and to the same extent in interstate-commerce matters.

The power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States is sovereign, exclusive, and complete. Congress may legislate in respect thereto to the same extent, both as to the rates and all other matters of regulation, as a State may do in respect of purely local or internal commerce.

As to the conduct of commerce, the whole subject of the liability of interstate railroad companies for the negligence of those in their service, these may be covered by national legislation enacted by Congress under its power to regulate commerce between the States. (Peirce v. Van Duzer, 58 Fed., 700.)

The power of Congress on this subject is plenary. It may legislate as to the qualifications, duties, and liabilities of employees and others on railway trains engaged in that commerce; and such legislation will supersede any State action on the subject. But until such legislation is had it is clearly within the competency of the States to provide against accidents on trains whilst within their limits. (Nashville XC R. R. Co., 123 U. S., 99.)

"COMMERCE," NOT "ARTICLES OF COMMERCE" ONLY, WITHIN THE POWER.

It was argued by the able Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] that a rate is not an article of commerce, and therefore not to be fixed by Congress. The shortest and simplest answer to that is that the power is not one to regulate "articles of commerce," but to regulate "commerce." Mr. President, if you were to take the rate out of interstate commerce, I fancy that Hamlet would be completely out of the play. You might as well take the axle out of the wheel or the spoke out of the hub. The rate is the thing that moves all, the mainspring of commerce amongst the States; and it would be just as reasonable to say that you can not regulate the rate because it is not an article of commerce as to say, "There is my watch; fix it up; but leave out the mainspring, and take care that you do not regulate that." There is nothing that concerns commerce among the States as a part thereof, the machinery thereof, or the persons employed therein that is not within the complete and exclusive regulation of the Congress of the United States.

NEVER A SINGLE JUDGE HAS GIVEN OPINION THAT THE LEGISLATURES IN STATES OR THE CONGRESS CAN NOT FIX RATES.

Mr. President, there is one remarkable thing about this question. On the great questions of income tax and of currency and on nearly all the great questions which have agitated the public mind we have seen vacillating and divided courts. Up to date not a single judge of the United States, not a single judge of all the hundreds who have had this subject under advisement, either in the State or in the Federal tribunals, has ever yet said that Congress has no power to fix rates in interstate commerce. There is more unanimity upon this subject in the judicial mind of this country than there has ever existed upon any subject since our Constitution was founded and submitted for the interpretation of man.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF CONGRESSIONAL POWER.

I shall refer now to the foundations of this power. When we turn to the specific source of Congressional power over the regulation of commerce we find them in more than one clause of the Constitution. Indeed, there as no less than five provisions of our Constitution which should be considered in endeavoring to grasp this subject.

Article I, section 1, of the Constitution says:

(1) All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in the Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

There is a general grant of "all legislative powers." Then come specific enumerations:

(2) To regulate commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and with the Indian tribes. (Art. I, sec. 8.)

* * * * * * *

(3) To establish post-offices and post-roads. (Art. I, sec. 8.)

(4) The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States. (Art. IV, sec. 3.)

That stretches over the District of Columbia and through the Territories, which are under the immediate jurisdiction of Congress.

(5) To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States and in any Department or officer thereof.

Is this not as wide, specific, and clear as lucid language can make it? It is all power, saving only in so far as some restriction may be placed upon it by other parts of the Constitution, as, for instance, that—

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in any other.

If there be any matter that belongs to commerce among the States, that matter is comprehended and embraced in that power.

How, Mr. President, can one at this stage of debate on this subject find provocation or comfort in challenging a power so universally recognized and just upon the stage of application? The inventive genius of man is strained to discover a trace of difficulty or doubt upon this subject. But a little comfort has been taken by a recent expression of Judge Harlan. In the course of his opinion in the Northern Securities case, 193 U. S., page 343, he used the following words:

Would it be said that Congress can meet such emergencies by prescribing rates by which interstate carriers shall be governed in the transportation of freight and passengers? If Congress has power to fix such rates, and upon that question we express no opinion, it does not choose to exercise its power in that way or about that question.

Judge Harlan in that case simply recognized a condition, that Congress was not regulating rates. He had no provocation to express a decisive question of the decisive subject, and any allusion was obiter dictum. But it does not follow that the judge has any doubt on this subject.

A corporation—

As he has said—

maintaining a public highway * * * must be held to have accepted its rights, privileges, and franchises subject to the condition of the government creating it, or the government within whose limits it conducts its business may by legislation protect the people against unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it.

In that same case, in which Judge Harlan thus passed by without opinion, Mr. Justice White said:

The plenary authority of Congress over interstate commerce, its right to regulate it to the fullest extent, to fix the rates to be charged for the movement of interstate commerce, to legislate concerning the ways and vehicles actually engaged in such traffic, and to exert any and every other power over such commerce which flows from the authority conferred by the Constitution, is thus conceded.

In the case of the Interstate Commerce Commission v. Cincinnati, etc., Railroad (167 U. S.), known generally as the "Maximum Rate case," Justice Brewer, giving the opinion of the Supreme Court, used these expressions:

There were three obvious and dissimilar courses open for consideration. Congress might itself prescribe the rates, or it might submit to some subordinate tribunal this duty, or it might leave with the companies the right to fix rates, subject to regulations and restrictions, as well as to that rule, which is as old as the existence of common carriers, to wit, that rates must be reasonable. * * * Administrative control over railroads through boards or commissions was no new thing. It had been resorted to in England and in many of the States of the Union.

Thus has the Supreme Court given the imprimatur of its utterance on this question.

NO CONTRACTION OF CONSTRUCTION JUSTIFIED BY THE HISTORY OF THE COMMERCE CLAUSE.

It has been said, Mr. President, that the history of the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States is conducive to narrow and contracted construction of its meaning. Let me read a little from Bancroft:

Of many causes promoting union, four above others exercised steady and commanding influence. The new Republic as one nation must have power to regulate its foreign commerce, to colonize its large domain, to provide an adequate revenue, and to establish justice in domestic trade by prohibiting the separate States from impairing the obligations of contracts. Each of these four causes was of vital importance; but the necessity for regulating commerce gave the immediate impulse to a more perfect Constitution. (Bancroft on the Constitution, 1st vol., 146.)

While these ends, Mr. President, were being discussed, and while the Americans were getting their minds together with a view to settling commercial questions, a British order in council was made in July, 1783, restricting to British subjects and ships the carrying of American produce from American ports to any British West India island and the carrying of the produce of those islands to any port in America.

This act of British imposition stung and aroused American spirit and drew together and impelled the States together to resist the common adversary.

VIRGINIA MARSHALS THE UNITED STATES ON THEIR WAY TO A BETTER UNION.

At the same time, while we were turning the face of the coming nation toward the East, there were those who were also looking toward the West.

The complete cession of the Northwest and the grant of the desired impost were the offerings of Virginia to the general welfare. Simultaneously, her legislature, in December, took cognizance of the aggression on equal commerce. The Virginians owned not much shipping and had no special interest in the West India trade, but the British prohibitory policy offended their pride and their sense of honor, and, as in the war they looked upon "union as the rock of their political salvation," so they again rang the bell to call the other States to council. They complained of "a disposition in Great Britain to gain partial advantages injurious to the rights of free commerce and repugnant to the principles of reciprocal interest and convenience, which form the only permanent foundation of friendly intercourse," and unanimously consented to empower Congress to adopt the most effectual mode of counteracting restrictions on American navigation so long as they should be continued. And Governor Harrison, by their direction, communicated the act to the executive authority of the other States, requesting the immediate adoption of similar measures, and he sent to the Delegates of his own State in Congress a report of what had been done. This is the first in the series of measures through which Virginia marshaled the United States on their way to a better Union. (Bancroft on the Constitution, 1st vol., 148.)

WASHINGTON SEEKING TO GRAPPLE EAST AND WEST TOGETHER.

Soon Washington's practical mind was seeking to grapple the East and the West together, and in the autumn of 1784, he was journeying among the streams and paths of the Alleghenies, sketching in his mind a system of internal communication of the Potomac with the Ohio; an affluent of the Ohio to Cuyahoga, and so from the site of Cleveland and Detroit and onward to the Lake of the Woods.

A little later the people of Maryland and Virginia petitioned jointly the legislatures of their respective States for the united action for improving the navigation of the Potomac, and we find Washington himself as the leading Virginia negotiator, where he successfully consummated his mission, the plan adopted being speedily passed by the legislatures of both States to their mutual satisfaction, and, as Washington hoped, to the advantage of the Union.

This is but a slender noting of a great chapter in our constitutional history. It shows, on the one hand, how, looking to the ocean, foreign commerce inspired union, and how, on the other hand, looking to the West, internal commercial communication by practical methods was begetting in the minds of men, a consideration which in time found expression in placing the regulation of commerce between the States on the same footing in the Constitution as that of regulation of commerce with foreign nations, whether by land or by sea. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] has admirably presented a phase of these views, which I will not repeat, but it powerfully reenforces them. It was from the broadest view and the wisest perspective of the human mind, looking to all points of the compass, that there grew out of the minds of the Constitution builders a foundation commensurate with the mighty framework which they were about to erect, all-comprehending as to the commercial power, exclusive in its nature, leaving nothing of commerce between State, foreign or domestic, that was not put in the power of the Congress of the United States.

JUDICIAL EXPOSITIONS ON THE POWER TO FIX RATES.

Mr. President, if we have been embarrassed, in mild degree, at least, by the injection of subjects of debate which would seem to have passed out of that category into settled question, the arguments employed deserve to be completely answered, not only by the philosophy of history and by the natural reading of our constitutional papers, but as well by the juridical expositions which have been passed upon this subject. In the centennial year, 1876, the case of Munn v. Illinois was decided by the United States Supreme Court. Chief Justice Waite, of Ohio, a broad-minded and learned man, one of great industry and patient attention, gave the opinion. His opinion is one of the most learned essays that have gone forth on this subject. The basic principles upon which he rested it have not from that day to this been disturbed or overruled. He showed how, under the power inherent in every sovereignty, a government may regulate the conduct of its citizens toward each other, and, when necessary for the public good, the manner in which each held or used his property.

He showed further how the exercise of these powers had been customary in England from time immemorial; how they had been exercised in this country from its first colonization to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, and, in so doing, to fix the maximum charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold. The statutes of all the thirteen original States, Mr. President, abound with such illustrations and show that our forefathers, when they were building States and molding them into a nation, had themselves no sense of the imperfection and impotence of the work which they were constructing.

Said Chief Justice Waite, in Munn v. Illinois (94 U. S., 113):

With the fifth amendment in force, Congress in 1820 conferred power upon the city of Washington to regulate rates of wharfage at private wharves; the sweeping of chimneys, and to fix the rates of fees therefor, * * * and the rate and quality of bread (3 Stat., 587, sec. 7); and in 1848 to make all necessary regulations respecting hackney carriages and the rates of fare of the same, and the rates of hauling by cartmen, wagoners, carmen, and draymen, and the rates of commissions of auctioneers (9 id., 224, sec. 2).

From this it is apparent that, down to the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, it was not supposed that statutes regulating the use, or even the price of the use, of private property necessarily deprived an owner of his property without due process of law. Under some circumstances they may, but not all. The amendment does not change the law in this particular; it simply prevents the States from doing that which will operate as such a deprivation.

This brings us to inquire as to the principles upon which this power of regulation rests, in order that we may determine what is within and what without its operative effect. Looking, then, to the common law, from whence came the right which the Constitution protects, we find that when private property is "affected with a public interest it ceases to be juris privati only." This was said by Lord Chief Justice Hale more than two hundred years ago in his treatise De Portibus Maris (1 Harg. Law Tracts, 78), and has been accepted without objection as an essential element in the law of property ever since. Property does become clothed with a public interest when used in a manner to make it of public consequence and affect the community at large. When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good to the extent of the interest he has thus created. He may withdraw his grant by discontinuing the use, but so long as he maintains the use he must submit to the control.

Mr. President, it will be perceived that not only does the regulation of commerce by Congress come within the clear and specific meaning of an expressly enumerated grant of power, but that in the very nature of the case and by the exercise of public employment under the jurisdiction of a sovereign power—the United States—it is a power so necessary to sovereignty, so absolutely indispensable to society, so inherent in the nature of the government of man that for centuries before this nation came into being it was exercised by our mother country, that it was brought here and introduced into every one of the States of this Union, and that by the common law, by the verdict of history, by the invariable habits of mankind, and by distinctive and clear expression of the Constitution of the United States Congress stands in the possession of this power to-day.

My distinguished and able friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who has made on this subject a speech of great instruction, one which illuminated to my own mind phases in the practical bearings of it which I had not understood or appreciated until I heard his discussion, will permit me to say—I hope without diminishing from my conception of his ability, his earnestness, his patriotism, or his power—that I conceive that he has used a misleading argument in his speech when he points out that Congress in chartering the Pacific railroads was exercising a proprietary power and not a power of regulation in prescribing their freights or putting conditions upon them such as we invoke here.

If the Senator will read the charter of the Pacific railroads, and if he will read the decisions of the courts in expounding that charter, he will see that the Supreme Court of the United States does not rest the power under any such narrow line of thought as that which he deliminates. It appears that that charter was not only over the territory described by him as under the proprietary rights of the United States, which owned it and was its immediate legislator, but that it applied as well to sovereign and perfected States. In the case of California v. Pacific Railroad Companies (127 U. S. Rep., p. 1) it will be found that the Supreme Court has held, in defining this power, that it is within the power of Congress to charter a railroad to run anywhere in the United States, across the States as well as across the Territories.

In the case of the Gettysburg battlefield the Supreme Court settled another question, which up to that time——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. One moment, just let me finish the sentence—which up to that time had not met with its definite adjudication—that is to say, that the United States possess complete eminent domain and for any public purpose may condemn and take the land of any citizen anywhere. In 127 United States they apply that to the charter of interstate-commerce corporations, making the circle round of the completed power of the United States on this subject.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. If I rightly understand the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, he entirely misapprehended the sense in which I employed the term "proprietary" in the connection mentioned by him. I did not employ that term in that connection to indicate that the Pacific railroads, the nature of the charter for which we were then considering, were constructed through lands belonging to the United States or other lands over which the United States had exclusive jurisdiction, as over the Territories; but I employed the term to indicate that it was the United States Government that had the proprietary right in the case mentioned to grant the charter, and, granting the charter, it had a right to attach, as a condition precedent to the enjoyment of the charter, any condition it saw fit to prescribe; and if it saw fit to prescribe in the granting of a charter under which a railroad was to be constructed a right to regulate rates of fare, the taking of a charter was an agreement to that restriction. That was the only sense in which I used the term. I had no thought of using the word "proprietary" in connection with the territory through which the road would run.

Now, as to the charter of those roads, the Senator will look in vain for anything in it indicating that the Congress granted that charter in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce. It granted the charter, as is expressly stated both in the title to the act and in the body of the act, in the exercise of its power to provide for the national defense, to establish post-offices and post-roads, etc.

It is true that in 127 United States, as the Senator says, there is found in the opinion of the court a statement to the effect that Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce, may authorize the construction of a road, and, I think, it goes so far as to say may construct and operate a road; but it is not true, as I understood the Senator to say, that that was an opinion of the court and that that part of the opinion of the court was necessary to the decision of that case. It was not. It was, on the contrary, as pure an obiter dictum as was ever uttered from the bench. It had no relevancy to the questions before the court at all. The opinion was written by a very careful judge, Mr. Justice Bradley, one for whom I have the most profound respect, but it was, nevertheless, nothing in its relation to that case than an obiter dictum pure and simple.

The point I made all the way through—I hope I do not interrupt the Senator too much; and, if I do, I shall be glad, of course, to desist——

Mr. DANIEL. I yield to the Senator with great pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. The point I made all the way through in connection with the use of the word "proprietary" was that the power to regulate commerce conferred by the Constitution on the Congress, subject only to the restrictions of the Constitution, is a plenary power, just as complete in itself as is the power of a State to regulate commerce.

But the question remains, What is the power of the State to regulate commerce? I contended then that the power of the State to fix rates was a proprietary right that does not belong to Congress in that connection. The State has the same right that the United States Government exercises when it grants a charter. The State incorporating a railroad can prescribe—and it retains the right, if it does not see fit so to prescribe in the charter—any regulation it may see fit. That is perfectly competent to the State, and the Supreme Court of the United States has never in any decision whatever passed upon the question of the right of the Federal Government in the exercise of the power to regulate commerce to prescribe what rates shall be charged, maximum or otherwise.

In the Munn case, on which the Senator comments and in connection with which he pays such a deserved tribute to the late Chief Justice Waite, the question was whether or not the State of Illinois had the power to prescribe maximum rates of charges for the use of elevators. In that connection, speaking of the sovereignties that were complete in themselves that have this proprietary right, he did quote what had been done by Congress with respect to the city of Washington in authorizing this city to prescribe maximum rates of charges for ferries and other public conveniences, but I called attention to the fact that, according to all the elementary authorities, that is not a delegation of legislative power in the sense in which we ordinarily discuss that question, but that it is an exception to that rule, quoting one authority only out of many that I might have quoted, because it is so elementary a proposition I did not think it necessary to dwell upon it.

So that there is nothing in the Munn case, where the authority under consideration was that of a State which had not only power to regulate commerce, but had the proprietary right to fix rates, and nothing in the citations the Senator makes as to what Congress did in respect to the city of Washington, which is out of the ordinary rule, that contravenes in any respect anything for which I contended.

The Senator will pardon me for such an extended interruption. I would not have done it only he was so gracious and so obliging that somehow or other when you get started in imposing on him you can not help it.

Mr. DANIEL. I am very glad the Senator interrupted me, but I think the Senator will take a good deal longer to explain his explanation. I hope, however, he will not do it now.

Mr. FORAKER. I will be content to let it stand in the RECORD alongside with what the Senator says, trusting that anybody who will read it will conclude that it does not need any explanation.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not mean to reflect upon the Senator at all, but I was attending in my own reflections to the fact that, instead of diminishing the powers of Congress, the Senator had shown by his remark that they had an additional power about building railroads, and that one of self-defense or national defense. Of course, if they may charter a railroad and build it and create it, they may put any regulation they please upon it. They can regulate it; and it occurs to me, Mr. President, that in developing a new aspect of the subject the Senator has in no wise contracted my argument, but simply enlarged and reenforced it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will not complain of me—I will not interrupt the Senator for a moment longer than it is agreeable—the Congress does have powers beyond the one power to regulate commerce. The point I am making is that we are proceeding here under the one independent power to regulate commerce, and that this power to do these other things is deducible, not alone from that power, but from the other powers that have been conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, we are proceeding here under all the powers we have got under the Constitution. If we have power to so proceed, whose business is it to question the power we are exercising, if we have got that power?

Furthermore, the Senator says, as if making some criticism or detraction from the arguments and citations that have been made, that the Supreme Court has never yet in a direct case passed upon a rate and held that a Congressional rate was all right. It has not passed upon such a question directly for the simple reason that no such question has ever been or could have been before it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, all I want——

Mr. DANIEL. Let me finish my sentence, if you please.

Mr. FORAKER. It is an open question.

Mr. DANIEL. It has never passed upon a rate enacted by Congress, because no rate enacted by Congress or an agency of Congress has ever been before it. The Senator says it is therefore an open question. That is a very broad remark to make in view of the fact that the court has time and again, over and over, year in and year out, recognized the power of a State within itself to make a rate, and declared, or taken for granted, and expounded as a principle that our power over commerce is complete, exclusive, and unlimited in the Constitution of the United States, and built up an analogous system on the subject in the United States compared with that of the States. It is true, however, and is obliged to be true, that this particular case in this particular form has never been presented to the Supreme Court of the United States—a fact that should be taken in connection with the other fact, that all the indicia of opinion and of expression on the subject have pointed to their conclusion in like manner as has been thus stated.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I was only going to suggest to the Senator that there is no difference of opinion between him and me as to what has been decided. The only point I was making a moment ago was this, that all the decisions of the Supreme Court with respect to rates have been with respect to rates made by the States through the acts of their legislatures or through agencies appointed by the legislatures of the States, and I was trying to distinguish now, as I did try at considerable length to distinguish when I addressed the Senate on that subject on February 28, between the power of the State to do that and the power of the Federal Government in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce.

That reminds me to say that the Senator a few moments ago commented upon my remarks at that time and took exception to what he said my statement was, that a rate was not an article of commerce. It is true I said it was not an article of commerce. I said more than that. I said that the rate charged by a carrier was not an article of commerce; neither was it an instrumentality of commerce; neither was it a facility of commerce; neither was it anything that had to do with the purpose of commerce which looks to the safe carriage of life and the safe carriage of property.

I can not any more than call attention to that at this time without unduly interrupting the Senator, and, of course, I do not want to do that; but I take advantage of this opportunity, through his kindness, to broaden his statement a little bit as to what I then said.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, of course I can not quote an opinion of the Supreme Court which has decided this question on the presentation of the actual case involving a rate made by Congress. All I claim is that the views expressed by the Supreme Court comprehend and embrace such a case, and before——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DANIEL. I yield for a question.

Mr. NELSON. Has not the Supreme Court, in substance, time and again decided that the power of Congress over interstate commerce is as broad and complete as that of the State over State commerce?

Mr. DANIEL. I think I have shown that that is the view of the courts.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Virginia will allow me, what the Supreme Court of the United States has time and again decided, to which the Senator from Minnesota refers, is that the power to regulate commerce conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government is as broad and plenary as the power to regulate commerce that belongs to a State. But the State, being a complete sovereignty, has this inherent proprietary right which enables it to go further than the Constitution authorizes the Congress to go. That is the distinction which has been made all the time.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Ohio that if the State has the power to regulate rates, why has not, in like manner, Congress the same power over interstate commerce that the State has over State commerce?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will read the remarks I made here on February 28 he will see stated at length why, in my opinion, the State has the power to regulate rates that does not belong to the Federal Government under the power to regulate commerce. I can not, in the time of the Senator from Virginia, answer at the length that it would be necessary for me to answer to properly make response to what the Senator from Minnesota says.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I will conclude what I have to say on this subject—that is, the power of Congress—by reading an extract from the opinion in the case of the Pensacola Telegraph Company v. The Western Union Telegraph Company (96 U. S.), in which Chief Justice Waite again gave the opinion. He sustained in that case the broad regulating power of Congress, and held that these powers extended in their application to telegraph lines, to the postal service, to military and post roads, and covered the whole territory of the United States, whether crossing State lines or no. He said:

> The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce or the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the Constitution of the country and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances.
>
> They extend from the horse and his rider to the stage coach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and the steamboat to the railroad, and from the railroad to the telegraph as these new agencies are brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth.
>
> They were intended for the use of the business to which they relate at all times and under all circumstances.
> As they were intrusted to the General Government for the good of the nation, it is not only the right but the duty of Congress to see to it that intercourse among the States and the transmission of intelligence are not obstructed or unnecessarily encumbered by State legislation.

These, Mr. President, are broad and deep-rooted principles, and it would be most curious indeed if the all-embracing power which has been expounded and illustrated in so many diverse forms, as going down to the hackney coach and to the ferry, across the ocean, along the railroad, and the telegraph line did not embrace that important, substantial, and most moving matter—the rate of freight or passenger travel upon a road. I am content thus to leave it.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS TO CREATE COMMISSIONS.

I will address myself now to another question. It is with reference to the power of Congress to put its power in the hands of a commission, and to a consideration of what is the due process of law which must be observed in dealing with questions which arise under the provisions of this measure. I heard, and I have read with deep interest, the able speech which was made on this floor by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. He predicated much that he had to say upon a general declaration in that speech, with which I feel obliged to take issue. He said:

> It is the heritage of every English-speaking man or association of men to have his rights determined in a court. It is for the court to decide what those rights are.

This is an idealistic view of the Federal Constitution. As I read that document this view is not sustained by an examination of the Supreme Court decisions. If we regard the facts disclosed by those decisions the declaration of the learned and distinguished Senator would only be made to conform accurately with them when qualified so as to read that "sometimes it is the heritage of every English-speaking man to have his rights determined in a court," for it is equally true, as a general allegation, that sometimes, indeed many times, it is not so, according to the Supreme Court view and according to the American practice.

The conclusions drawn from this broad assertion by the Senator from Pennsylvania he thus expressed:

> An attempt to specify what right shall be determined by the court might be fatal to the constitutionality of the legislation. If the specification should not include all his rights, he would be shorn of a constitutional privilege. Should it undertake to enumerate rights which he could not establish, it would be meaningless and unintelligent legislation. If his rights are determined solely by the Constitution, that instrument would be the measure employed in their determination. If he has rights vested upon some other foundation, a limitation placed upon him to have nothing but his constitutional rights determined would be a fatal objection.

So the declaration of the Senator is designed by him to apply to every right of a citizen, and to maintain that as to his every right he can not be made to suffer without having provision made by Federal law that deals with it for testing that right in court. Any other test by an administrative board, however dignified, however competent, would be to his mind incomplete and would lack the qualities of due process of law.

But the declaration of the Senator and his conclusions are alike refuted by the Supreme Court of the United States in many decisions to which I shall presently advert. Here let me say that I do not overlook the fact that the Senator, from whose utterance I dissent, has been eminently fair and impartial in applying the doctrine he contends for, and by no means confines its protection to the carrier. He upholds, amplifies, and extends it to the shipper and the passenger. He would require, when an injunctive process issues from a court, to suspend for a time being a rate fixed by the Commission, a cash deposit or bond should be given by the carrier that would secure to the parties entitled to repayment the difference between the Commission's rate and the railroad rate if the Commission's rate were sustained.

OFTEN NOT THE HERITAGE OF AN AMERICAN CITIZEN TO HAVE HIS RIGHTS DETERMINED IN A COURT.

I undertake to say, in contravention of the broad, general, axiomatic expression of the Senator, that there are many cases in this country in which the highest and most sacred rights of property and of persons are passed upon finally under administrative law. I also undertake to say that they are of equal dignity, if not of greater dignity, than anything that is involved in the rates of passenger or freight traffic.

I wish, then, Mr. President, in order to get at the meat of this matter, as it underlies the measure which we are endeavoring to mold, to discuss what is due process of law.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DANIEL. With great pleasure.

Mr. KNOX. Of course it was my own misfortune as well as my own fault if the Senator from Virginia understood that portion of my remarks which he has just read to apply to any other class of rights than the class of rights proposed to be dealt with in this legislation—that is, rights of property, vested rights. Of course I would probably be one of the last men to stand upon the floor of the Senate and deny that under the domain of administrative law, where the nation or a State is dealing with that over which it has complete control, the rights of parties are very often, indeed almost generally, disposed of through administrative boards, as, for instance, the rights of the citizen to transmit his mail and the conditions under which he shall be permitted to transmit it through the post-office. That is a matter over which the Congress has complete control, and of course the administration of the affairs of that Department can be dealt with by Congress as it sees fit. So in the case of the distribution of public lands; so in the case of the citizenship of Indians; so in the case of immigration. Anything over which the Government has complete control and where it defines the rights of parties, of course can be handled through an administrative board.

Mr. ALDRICH. In custom matters.

Mr. KNOX. And in custom cases. But my proposition, of course, had to do only with the rights we were undertaking to deal with in this legislation; and I hold myself unfortunate that I did not more specifically indicate it. I presumed it would be assumed by those who read my remarks, and any criticism the Senator from Virginia may have upon the assertion based upon these administrative cases of course I freely accept.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no doubt the Senator fully understands the difference between those cases in which administrative law is held to be conclusive by the courts and those in which it is held that the term "due process of law" involves juridical process. At the same time, I had to treat the Senator's speech as he uttered it. I have seen that broad, sweeping sentence of the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania put in newspapers as a campaign banner, so to speak, and as matter of rebuke and caution to those who would undertake to narrow the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in this matter. I am sure it was simply a general utterance, and had the Senator cautioned his own mind he would have confined it, as the courts confined it, to a particular class of cases, to which I shall presently refer.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Only for a moment. I merely want to add to what I have already said that the Senator will observe that all of the authorities I cited in support of that proposition show the distinction which I have just now undertaken to draw between the two classes of rights. So one could hardly in reading the speech as a whole or in listening to it as a whole be mistaken as to the intention.

Mr. DANIEL. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind as to the perfect fairness and candor of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I never intended to intimate a criticism of that character in any way whatsoever. But the Senator speaks from a standpoint of such authority upon questions of law and his reputation and character are so well known that I merely apprehended that if that broad statement were continuously quoted without the explanations which belong to it, it might put some who entertain somewhat different opinions from the Senator from Pennsylvania in an ill light of criticism before other minds which did not appreciate these distinctions as he does.

I also wish to make it a basis for showing, if I may, the distinctions taken on the class of cases in which the courts consider that due process of law involves juridical process and those taken on that other class of cases which require only administrative powers as due process of law.

"DUE PROCESS OF LAW" AND "LAW OF THE LAND."

Due process of law is generally interpreted in our form of government to be an expression equivalent, or nearly so, with the term "law of the land" as used in Magna Charta. It is that law which the people themselves have ordained and laid down for the regulation of their society and to which they have become accustomed.

(1) The constitution of a State is the law of the land for that State, and observance of the procedures which it commands is due process of law.

(2) The Constitution of the United States is the law of the land for the whole Union, and procedures in consonance with that Constitution, and none other, are due process of law.

No interpretation of the law of the land or due process of law has so put its inhibition upon the power of Congress or of a State legislature as to require either body to preserve upon the statute books of the country any particular remedial statute of jurisdiction whatsoever, whether of criminal law, municipal law, civil law, or equity, which may be there at this time, provided only that a legislature under the Constitution and according to judicial construction can not remove an existing statute upon which contracts have been built so as to tear down those contracts or to subtract from their substance and foundation; provided, too, that jury trials are preserved where required by the law of the land; and provided also, that in changing some existing due process of law a legislature shall leave a fitting and appropriate remedy against constitutional wrong which preserves to the citizen the right to be heard in court when the original question of legal right or wrong is juridical, or where the original question is purely administrative leaves the right to be heard by an administrative body. To go beyond this would be to freeze, if not to completely paralyze, the powers of the legislation, and to put a bar to those changes of legal progress which may be deemed essential by representative bodies to advancement in the science of judicature and administration.

"DUE PROCESS OF LAW" OLDER THAN MAGNA CHARTA.

The term "due process of law," as used by constitutions and courts, is older in English history than Magna Charta, accorded by King John to the Barons at Runnymede in 1215, nearly seven hundred years ago. Since that period of English history, whatever aberrations our race has been afflicted with, however star-chamber courts, military courts, or usurping magistrates have invaded the law of the land, and however passionate mobs or revolutionary movements have swept over it in waves of frenzy, the masses of the people of our country and of our race have adhered in their devotion to the sacred rights of due process and law of the land, for they are basic to our liberties. These terms are a legal guaranty, and there is no principle of our liberties to which we should be more devoted or which we should more faithfully defend.

CORPORATIONS, LIKE INDIVIDUALS, ENTITLED TO PROCESS OF LAW.

Since the rise of corporations—artificial persons, as they are called—and since the fourteenth amendment was adopted, it has been established beyond debate by the courts that the corporation is a person in the sense of the Constitution, and decisions to this effect are so accepted that no one challenges them or seeks to reverse them.

It is to be remembered in the consideration of such a matter as this that whatever may be the weaknesses or the wickedness of corporations which have been developed, and whatever and however justly offenses have been imputed to them, they are no more and no less than an aggregate of human beings, concatenated together by popular opinion and by regulative enactment, and with all their vices and with all their faults they are no more and no less than reflexes of the conduct of the people of flesh and blood who compose them. It must be remembered, too, that if they be but man-made, artificial creatures, the people were and continue to be their creators, and in some respects their beneficiaries as well as their victims. Like all artificial and natural creatures they are mixtures of good and evil.

A corporation is, in fact, only a shell with a fancy name upon it. Everything inside of the shell is property acquired under charters which the people themselves have granted, plus the human beings who own the property, in the shares prescribed by law, and plus or minus the water which may in some sort of fashion have inflated the shares. These corporations, being created by law and living by and under law, have just the same title to be protected by the law of the land and by due process of that law as has every individual citizen of our country, whether he be on the inside or the outside of the corporate shell.

What, then, is the definitive meaning of law of the land and process of law as applied to such cases as this? Just this: That every individual, whether a human person or a composite person called a corporation, is entitled to have and hold his, her, or its property, his, her, or its liberty, in accordance with the laws of this land, made in pursuance of constitutional authority. The law of the land embraces the statutes as well as the Constitution. It is the general law, which, as Daniel Webster declared, "hears before it condemns, which proceeds upon inquiry and renders judgment only after trial;" "and has," he added, "the meaning that every citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of the general rules which govern society."

Another master of jurisprudence has said:

> The good sense of mankind has at length settled down to this, that they were intended to secure the individual from arbitrary exercise of the powers of government, unrestrained by the established principles of private right and distributive justice.

"DUE PROCESS OF LAW" SOMETIMES INCLUDES JURIDICAL POWERS AND SOMETIMES DOES NOT.

This law of the land, or due process, however, does not require that there shall be the same process of law or the same law of the land with reference to classes of persons or things which are in their nature different and which according to their nature require a variation of methods.

Story struck the right keynote when he said in his work on the Constitution that different principles are applicable in different cases and require different forms and proceedings. In some they must be judicial; in others not. (See Story on the Constitution, sec. 1943–1946.)

Every lawyer must realize that procedures must vary according to the nature of the things to be governed. A proceeding in attachment against an absconding debtor must ex necessitate rei vary from that of a suit of ejectment for land.

THE SETTLED MEASURES OF LAW FOR THE PROTECTION OF RIGHTS MUST BE OBSERVED.

A proceeding in libel against a piratical ship must vary from a proceeding for the partition of an estate or for enforcing in equity a resulting trust. So Story adds that "due process of law" in each particular case means such an exercise of the powers of government as settled maxims of law permit and sanction, and under such safeguards for the protection of the individual rights as those maxims prescribe for the class of cases to which the one being dealt with belongs. In short, then, we must deal with these cases of interstate transportation according to their kind, using such instrumentalities, observing such mechanisms, using such safeguards, as properly, naturally, customarily apply to the conditions and interests which we deal with and directing them to the protection of all individuals and all corporate rights involved.

JUDICIAL REVIEW OR APPEAL, OR BOTH, IN EQUITY.

Let me now advert to the application of these general principles and bring them to bear upon the question which has been here raised. That question is twofold. Shall we provide in this bill for the juridicial review or a judicial appeal from the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in a given case? Are we obliged to do it or otherwise leave the bill in unconstitutional form? I share in the opinion that it is wisest and best to provide for either a judicial review or appeal, but at the same time I do not doubt that if no judicial appeal or review were provided for, the system of equitable jurisdiction which has been administered with reference to such cases for at least thirty years would prove sufficient to comprehend and to secure to all parties in interest every right to which they may justly lay claim.

COMMISSIONS AND COURTS BOTH LIABLE TO ERROR.

When a passenger or a shipper has brought a case of alleged wrong before the Interstate Commerce Commission, that body may decide in favor of him or against him. It is just as liable to err as a court, or if not so, it would be only because the Commissioners are more apt to be more familiar with the intricacies and bearings of rate questions than courts are. The men who constitute the Commission are likely to be and are assumed to be upright and honorable men. As a rule also, judges are likewise; and if there be any difference between judges and the Interstate Commerce Commission with respect to liability to err, there is a certain degree in favor of the lesser liability, in so far as the law is concerned, in favor of the judges, from the fact that they must be technically at least learned in the law, and are more apt to be trained and versed in that profession.

Now, suppose the Interstate Commerce Commission decides against a shipper or a passenger, or whosoever may claim that the transportation company has acted with error. No matter what the shipper or passenger may lose, he is at the jumping-off place and is done with unless he may appeal to a court.

Suppose that there should be such a decision against a corporation, and the corporation goes off with a sense of grievance—and the side that goes off is apt to go with a sense of grievance—is it wisest and best for the people of this country to leave the matter solely with the Interstate Commerce Commission? Men are more careful and painstaking when a reviewing body may scrutinize and pass upon their work.

THE EXISTING JURIDICAL STATUS.

But, Mr. President, I apprehend that we are foreclosed from the consideration of that subject by the juridical status of this case. As an original question, it may have been wisest and best to have reposed the whole subject of freight making in the hands of an expert and honorable commission, who would study that single subject continuously and make themselves thoroughly conversant therewith; but we do not do it, and the courts have established a system of equitable review. We have the same power to do it that the States have with respect to State charters, and that the country has with respect to Federal or national charters to repose such power in the directors of railroads. No director of any railroad has any natural right to fix freight or passenger tolls on a public highway. There has not been a day in the history of this country since a railroad was run that the tolls of that railroad were not fixed under powers delegated by the State legislatures or under powers delegated by the Federal Government. The corporation itself had no power whatsoever save what the State gave it in the one case, and the Federal corporation had no power, nor have its directors any power, nor have its officers any power, save such as were granted by Congress.

If Congress could grant to the corporation the power to make tolls and to directors to act for them in making tolls, it has the same power to grant to commissions to make tolls.

Then, Mr. President, when they grant the power to prescribe tolls according to the certain standard of reasonable and just tolls, why may they not close the matter there and let the Commission's judgment stand for good and all?

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE CORPORATIONS; AND CORPORATIONS OF PUBLIC SERVICE IMPRESSED WITH A PUBLIC USE.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I assume the Senator would also claim that the directors in any corporation would have no powers except such as were granted by a State or by the National Government?

Mr. DANIEL. Why, of course.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator, I suppose, does not mean to have us infer from that that either a State government or the National Government would undertake to say what private corporations should charge for articles of merchandise, or how they should conduct their business?

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the consideration of private corporations has no more to do with the subject we are discussing than has the man in the moon, and the Senator might as pertinently ask me as to whether or not I consider——

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. DANIEL. Let me answer the question, please. Just wait a little while until I answer. The Senator might as pertinently ask me whether I consider that the moon is made of green cheese. The transportation corporations of this country are neither public nor private corporations. A public corporation is one that is solely organized for public purposes, such as a city, a town, a county. That is a public corporation. A private corporation is one that is solely organized for private purposes, such, for instance, as a corporation to sell green groceries or books. A transportation company or common carrier is in the nature of both a public and a private corporation, public in the sense that it has granted to it the State or Federal power of eminent domain, that it is authorized to take the realty of the citizen in invitum and appropriate it to its own use, and, in the next place, because it exercises a public calling which its charter has authorized it to pursue, either by the State or by the nation. That is the difference.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; for a question, but I would like to get on with my discourse.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not about to ask a question, but I was about to state the reason why I asked the question which I did.

The Senator was proceeding upon the theory that directors of railroad corporations have no rights except those given them by the Government, and therefore that the Government could transfer the powers of railroad directors to a commission of its own creation. He made no distinction, and apparently the sole reason was the fact that the corporation existed by reason of national action or State action, and therefore we could undertake to control all of its affairs. He did not then make the distinction which he has since made between what he calls private corporations and railroad companies, which I supposed he would make.

Mr. DANIEL. Some of us can not say all we are thinking in one sentence, and we apprehend, as a rule, that gentlemen who are hearing that sentence understand its connection. I have no doubt a little reflection would have brought these same thoughts to the mind of the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was afraid the Senator might be led into the same style of argument of which he accused the Senator from Pennsylvania a few minutes ago. He is a great lawyer, and he is speaking ex cathedra upon these subjects. I was afraid somebody might hear his remarks or read them and conclude that he thought the Government of the United States having created private corporations, it could appoint commissions to control their business.

Mr. DANIEL. I am speaking, Mr. President, on one subject, on the subject of the corporations to conduct commerce between States—public-service corporations—that offer themselves as carriers for public patronage, that have exercised the right of eminent domain in the State and could get it from the country for public use. If the Senator will read, after it is printed, what I have said and should find that I have run off the track and made too broad an assertion, I would be very glad to correct it.

I was merely defining what I conceive to be the status of these corporations in order the better to apply to questions before us a consideration of what is due process of law with respect to them in this case. I will turn at once now to that, and to a differentiation of the juridical cases and those which are administrative in their nature.

THE JURISDICTION OF FEDERAL COURTS AND THE INJUNCTION.

It is proposed, Mr. President, to recognize in this bill the right of a carrier which has been subjected to a rate to which it was opposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to file an original bill in equity in a circuit court of the United States, and thereby to set aside the rate fixed by the Commission. It is contended that it would be appropriate after the Commission had fixed the rate to withhold from the power of the circuit court the legal right to issue an injunction and stay the application of the rate prescribed by the Commission until the whole case was fully heard.

I am not permitted by my own reading of cases upon this subject to follow what might be the bent either of my own preference or my own opinion. The juridical status of any legal question is as much a fact as if it were composed of so much matter which could be weighed or measured. As I read the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and there are not a few of them, it practically holds that when a rate has been fixed by any commission acting under Congressional power, the court of equity is open for that rate to be brought in question by any party in interest who has suffered by its infliction, and that it is appropriate under old and hoary principles of equity jurisdiction to issue an interlocutory injunction and hold the whole matter in abeyance until the subject is completely investigated and adjudicated.

Finding many decisions to this effect and finding that this practice has been observed in many cases from States in which the actions of State legislatures and State commissions have been brought to the bar of equitable consideration, I am obliged to recognize that such is the established equity practice in this country, and such also is the settled view of the Supreme Court of the United States.

THE INJUNCTION OLDER THAN MAGNA CHARTA.

The injunctive process of the court of equity is a very ancient process, older than Magna Charta. Mr. Spence, in his great work on equitable jurisprudence, finds, as he says, the first introduction of the injunction in the reign of Henry Beauclerc, the annual date of which is not given, but it was between 1100 and 1136, the period of his reign. From that day to this injunction has grown. It was borrowed from the Roman law, the interdict of the old Roman prætor, and, like the great body of the refined and conscionable principles of equity jurisprudence, it was ingrafted upon the narrow though manly and self-assertive jurisprudence of the common law by importation from the rich and fertile judicial system of Rome, the greatest nation of antiquity.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator from Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator from Virginia hold that not only the processes and writs and practices of the court of chancery in England were adopted, but that the whole body of equity jurisprudence was adopted by the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, the Senator must let me answer, perhaps, by paraphrase. I do not hold that this country or this Congress is held down to any particular practice of any former generation whatsoever, saving only what is embodied in the Constitution of the United States. I have endeavored to define as clearly as I could in a previous portion of my remarks that if the new statute or amendment of existing law takes place so as to preserve in vitality and vigor a complete remedy to the person who has an ancient remedy, it is enough. I will illustrate, if the Senator will withhold his question a little while, in what limitations I express this view and why I fear the danger point would arise if his amendment were adopted, and also how I would respectfully suggest that some of the danger in that point might be avoided.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I meant to indicate to the Senator the difficulty that would arise if we hold that Congress is powerless to modify the practice of proceeding or writs of a court of equity, because it must necessarily follow, then, that the great principles of equity jurisprudence are beyond the control of the Congress. I hardly think that any Senator would be willing to go that far. To say that we can not change the practice or processes, and yet that we can abolish the rule of decision, seems to be a very curious contention.

But I waive that aside, in view of the Senator's answer, and I ask him if he will be good enough to lay before the Senate any decision which holds that intermediate process is necessary to the due process of law? I heard him quote, during the course of his remarks, Webster's famous definition of the law of the land, which, as I recollect now, was a part of his address to the court in the Dartmouth College case. He described it as a system under which the matter is heard before it is decided.

So far as I am informed, I do not believe the Senator can find any cases which hold that intermediate process is essential to due process of law. I am glad, however, to see that the Senator from Virginia abandons the objections offered by others to my amendment and puts it upon the due-process clause of the Constitution instead of the judicial clause.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I am undertaking to develop a conception of this case which requires a succession of ideas and not the summary utterances of a single one. While interruptions may be naturally provoked by a certain unqualified utterance of a speaker, it is very often the case that if he were to unfold the whole of his thought the interruption would itself be answered. Do not suppose for a moment that I am complaining, Mr. President. I consider that the Senator's exposition of the powers of Congress with respect to the inferior courts of this country, which it is authorized by the Constitution to create, was a masterly and unanswerable exposition of that great theme. I will not say that I heard every word of it; I will not say that I have read every line of it; but its substantive thought utters my convictions not less than his. Nevertheless, there is an honest and sincere difficulty in my own mind in reaching the conclusion that it is wisest and best to prohibit the issue of an interlocutory injunction or a suspension of the rate until a court has passed upon it.

If I were at this moment called upon as a judge to decide that question, I should hesitate and I should desire to study it further. It is one of the most delicate subjects of our whole jurisprudence; and until I had heard it discussed pro and con and had had the very best light put before my mind that could be adressed to its consideration, I should hesitate to express my own judgment. The leaning of my mind, just as is that of the Senator from Texas, is against political power in courts, and many of the decisions of the Supreme Court on this great subject I have read with much comfort and pleasure, because the judges have time and again declared that in no case would they set aside the action of a commission unless it was palpable to their minds—plainly and clearly palpable—that the Commission had in effect taken property without full compensation. It is apropos of that declaration, which is one of the fundamental principles of the Supreme Court upon this subject, that I feel that there arises a danger in this case, to express it mildly, of undertaking by Congress to say that a remedy which has been employed for thirty years, which has become customary to the jurisprudence of the United States, which is habitual in its exercise before the courts, and which the courts have employed with the approbation of all their judges—I am afraid that if that were to go before that same court, as it naturally would, they would say that in this case the carrier has not had due process of law, and then, Mr. President, what would be the situation of this controversy? I do not doubt that you can make the general jurisdiction of the circuit court, or of any other court which Congress creates, what in your wise judgment may be your pleasure, but the case before us is not one as to the jurisdiction of the courts so much as it is what are you going to do with a case, by subtracting a case or a particular class of cases from a general jurisdiction which you have declared to be wise and just? It is a narrower question we are now discussing than the general jurisdiction of courts.

It will be observed when we read certain other decisions that however it may be with administrative matters before the executive department of this Government, it has been the habitual ruling of the Supreme Court, that with respect to rates fixed by a State legislature or rates fixed by a State commission, neither the legislature nor the commission can make those rates conclusive, but that a United States court has the right, under the Constitution of the United States and through the process of a bill in equity, to bring the parties before the bar of a United States court, and, if such rate is found to be unjust, to set aside that rate as one that lacks in due process of law.

Nor can it be doubted that the same jurisprudence will be exercised by the United States courts as to matters of the United States. That is a juridical status that looks Congress in the face. Now, then, what has the interlocutory injunction to do with it? What is an issue in an interlocutory injunction? The issue of an interlocutory injunction is never a matter of right, but rests in the sound discretion of a court. In order to obtain an interlocutory injunction a plaintiff must show one of several things: First, either that there is no doubt of the wrongful nature of the act sought to be enjoined. Suppose it be true that it is obvious to a chancellor, as soon as he looks at a bill in equity, that a wrong has been done; is it wise for Congress to say that he shall not relieve the plaintiff? Second, or that his own claim of right has been acquiesced in without question for a long time, or that the injury which will result to himself from the refusal of the injunction will be very great and that to the defendant, from the issue thereof, very slight. Otherwise an interlocutory injunction will be denied.

I take that from a short summary in Foster's Federal Practice, volume 1, page 233.

THE STATUS WHEN THERE IS A CONFISCATORY RATE ON THE CARRIER ON ONE SIDE AND A HEAVY FINE ON THE OTHER.

Let us put ourselves in the attitude of a carrier suitor in a United States court in a case where the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed a rate which it charges is confiscatory of its property and does not accord to it the just compensation which is required by the Constitution of the United States. By another provision of this bill, section 16, that carrier is charged $5,000 a day as a fine while he is suing in court to ask the court simply to let matters stand in statu quo until he can be fully heard. Unless he has instantly adopted and put in force the rate to which he objects, $5,000 fine per day is accumulating upon him; and when, on the other hand, the difference between what the carrier considers a righteous rate and what the Interstate Commerce Commission considers a righteous rate may amount to another $5,000 a day going out of his pocket. Is it wise, is it just, is it equitable, unconditionally to put that individual, be it corporation or man, under the pitiless storm of an incessant fine and subject him at the same time to an incessant loss until such time as everybody may be fully and finally heard and denying him the customary process of the court for his protection? It does not strike my own mind, Mr. President, as wise and equitable to do this.

JUDGE CURTIS'S OPINION IN 18 HOWARD'S REPORTS, REVENUE CLAIMS.

I am further disturbed in my meditations on this subject by reading some of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, out of which I deduce what is regarded by the courts of this country as the difference between due process of law in purely administrative cases and due process of law in those cases of a peculiar kind, which require juridical process to their finality. I turn, Mr. President, to the case of Murray's Lessee et al. v. The Hoboken Land and Improvement Company. It is in 18 Howard's Reports, 272.

It was an action of ejectment. Both parties asserted title under Samuel Swartwout, the plaintiff, by virtue of an execution, sale, and deed made on judgment obtained in the regular course of judicial proceedings against him and the defendant, by a seizure and sale by the marshal of the United States, under the distress warrant issued by the Solicitor of the Treasury, under the act of Congress of May 20, 1820. Let it be noted that the Solicitor of the Treasury issued the distress warrant, not a judge. The Supreme Court of the United States unanimously held that the power exercised was executive and not judicial, and that the issue of the writ and the proceedings under it were due process of law within the meaning of the Constitution.

Judge Curtis gave the opinion of the Supreme Court. It is rare than one can read a more minute, learned, or more carefully considered opinion. It enters into the sinuosities and irregularities of our jurisprudence and into the diversified forms of process of law. In holding that the distress warrant was due process of law in the taking and selling out of real estate on executive action, he reaches that conclusion by a profound study of the history of English and American jurisprudence. It was a Government claim which related to the revenue which had in English jurisprudence the peculiarities which belong to the summary process that pertains to the revenues of the Crown. The judge said:

Tested by the common statute law of England prior to the emigration of our ancestors, and by the laws of many of the States at the time of the adoption of this amendment, the proceedings authorized by the act of 1820 can not be denied to be due process of law when applied to the ascertainment and recovery of balances due to the Government from a collector of customs, unless there exists in the Constitution some other provision which restrains Congress from authorizing such proceedings.

So that you trace the due process of law in this case to the fountain of the revenues of the Crown in England and of the Government in the United States.

DUE PROCESS GENERALLY IMPLIES A SETTLED COURSE OF JUDICIAL PROCEEDING.

Now I read another sentence from this eminent jurist:

For, though "due process of law" generally implies and includes actor, reus, judex, regular allegations, opportunity to answer, and a trial according to some settled course of judicial proceeding.

I would underscore those words, marked as they were in the language of this judge, that as a rule due process of law required the regular hearing and the trial according to some settled course of judicial proceeding.

Yet—

He said—

this is not universally true. There may be, and we have seen that there are, cases under the law of England after Magna Charta, and as it was brought to this country and acted on here, in which process in its nature final issues against the body, lands, and goods of certain public debtors without any such trial; and this brings us to the question whether those provisions of the Constitution which relate to the judicial power are incompatible with these proceedings.

WORDS OF CAUTION.

To avoid misconstruction—

Says the judge, and here come in words which I read with a sense of caution and from which I take warning—

To avoid misconstruction upon so grave a subject, we think it proper to state that we do not consider Congress can either withdraw from judicial cognizance any matter which, from its nature, is the subject of a suit at the common law or in equity or admiralty, nor, on the other hand, can it bring under the judicial power a matter which, from its nature, is not a subject for judicial determination.

Ask the question, "Is this question of a rate as confiscatory of property made by a commission now—if so, how long has it been—the subject of a suit at the common law or in equity or in admiralty?" Unquestionably, Mr. President, the true answer to that question must be that to-day and through the whole course of the jurisprudence of the United States Supreme Court on this subject this is a case held to be peculiarly appropriate to equity. Yet it is proposed to paralyze the strong arm of equity while the law is inflicting a penalty at the rate of $5,000 a day upon the one hand and while, if there be wrong, the pocket is open and pouring out upon the other.

Mr. President, in this great opinion, which is basic of nearly all the decisions which have since ramified through the Departments and the courts, I think the judge takes to pieces this whole subject and clarifies it with the illuminations of a learned, honest, and just mind.

At the same time—

Says Judge Curtis—

At the same time there are matters involving public rights which may be presented in such form that the judicial power is capable of acting on them and which are susceptible of judicial determination, but which Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, as it may deem proper.

That is the second class of cases.

The third class he thus refers to:

Equitable claims to land by the inhabitants of ceded territories form a striking instance of such a class of cases, and as it depends upon the will of Congress whether a remedy in the courts shall be allowed at all in such cases, they may regulate it and prescribe such rules of determination as they may think just and needful. Thus it has been repeatedly decided in this class of cases that upon their trial the acts of executive officers, done under the authority of Congress, were conclusive, either upon particular facts involved in the inquiry or upon the whole title.

* * * * * * *

The fourth class he thus points out:

It is true also that even in a suit between private persons to try a question of private right the action of the executive power, upon a matter committed to its determination by the Constitution and laws, is conclusive.

Thus it will be seen that there are four classes of cases to which the Supreme Court in the case I am considering refers.

1. Those in which "due process of law" includes juridical process—that is, cases which are the subject of suits at common law or in equity or admiralty. These are the cases declared to be unwithdrawable by Congress from judicial cognizance.

2. Matters involving public rights, which Congress may place within judicial cognizance or not as it may deem proper.

3. Cases in which Congress may grant a remedy or not as it sees fit and prescribe such rules of determination as it considers just and needful.

4. Certain matters of private right which Congress may submit to Executive determination conclusively.

THE CLASS OF CASES TO WHICH THE FIXING OF A RATE BELONGS.

Now, Mr. President, I have examined this proposition to take away the right to issue interlocutory injunctions from a court of equity pending that time when a rate is hanging between the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the invited further decision of a court.

Originally a rate is fixed generally in this country by the directors of a corporation. If that rate be an erroneous and oppressive rate, everybody who has that rate imposed upon him for passenger travel or for freight traffic is wronged; but, Mr. President, there is not a moment after that wrong commences when the courts in this country are not open to the citizen to challenge the wrong and to assert his remedy against it. As soon as the wrong, if it be one, in interstate commerce is challenged, the Interstate Commerce Commission investigates it. When it decides that the rate was wrong and puts in another one, the process of law is in course of progress toward maturity, and the corporate property and the use thereof and the compensation therefor are matters in a certain sense under the surveillance and protection of the court, or at least within reach of a remedy.

It is almost as ancient as the hills that when property is in litigation and in course of legal procedure a court of equity will hold the scales in hand between the parties and keep things in statu quo until it is ready to make up its mind upon the subject, and say which way the right or the wrong shall go. The interlocutory injunctions which are issued in rate cases are predicated upon doctrines almost as old as equity, and if you intend to exercise the equitable jurisdiction and leave the bill in equity as the proper procedure in this case, I can not see my way clear to maim the hand which is lifted to apply the remedies of equity, or to attempt to shear the court of any of the rights and discretions which properly belong to the chancellor in such a case. I do believe, however, that the nature of this case is such that a better way may possibly be devised, and one which would lead to swifter decision, which, indeed, is the great end which all are seeking to subserve through the processes that are being devised.

THE LAW'S DELAY.

I have read of a case quoted here in which there was a loss of $300,000 on one side before the case could be heard. Mr. President, undoubtedly the great evil that underlies the double jurisdiction of Commission and court arises from the fact of the law's delay. Delay is destructive of equity. Rates are like perishable goods. A rate is of to-day. How it would fit three months hence who can tell? What it may be a year hence who can tell? The danger is that the wrong will have been accomplished before you get a hearing of the voice that appeals for right, and that conditions are so fluctuating and changeable that it is very difficult in any event to reach a rectification.

CARRIERS FREQUENTLY PUT ONLY PART OF THEIR TESTIMONY BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

Now, the present system is that when the rate is fixed by the Commission a bill is filed in a Federal court. What happens? The carrier goes into that court and makes the case entirely de novo. I am informed that out of some thirty-two cases decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission, while some twenty-six of them were overruled, it was by new testimony which went to the court and which did not go to the Commission. I have no doubt that the Commission has suffered in public estimate and certainly has undergone most unjust criticism from the fact that the cases decided by the court, which took different views from the Commissioners, were wholly different cases, made up in the court after the Commission had passed upon the subject. In several of these cases in the United States courts the judges have commented upon the fact and have rebuked the practice of railroad companies making new cases in the courts after they have made an imperfect showing and but a partial presentation of their case before the Commission.

Now, then, delay is the great trouble to be obviated, if possible, and the partial hearing before the Commission, antedating full hearing before the court, has been one of the processes by which this delay was increased and by which additional wrong was done. It is the policy and duty of Congress, and it should challenge the best efforts of constructive statesmanship to devise the best plan, regardful of everybody's rights, to get the case from the Commission into the court and to get a speedy hearing. If Congress can accomplish that great result in this bill it will be the author of a piece of remedial legislation which will be useful to all the good citizens of this country and a pillar of righteous, equitable, and just Federal jurisprudence.

CARRIERS AND OTHER PARTIES SHOULD BE REQUIRED TO PUT IN ALL THEIR EVIDENCE BEFORE THE COMMISSION.

It is with diffidence, sir, that I make any suggestion upon the subject, and yet these thoughts have occurred to my mind as thoughts which perhaps might be useful to one who would undertake to accomplish this end. The suggestion that I would make would first be this: Require in this bill that the carrier and all other parties in interest who have a case before the Interstate Commerce Commission shall adduce all the evidence in their behalf on the hearing before the Commission. Why not? Is not that right? Leges vigilantibus, non dormientibus perveniunt.

That is the way the wise jurisprudence of old Rome dealt with such matters. The laws are ready to help people who are awake, but not those who sleep upon their rights. Congress have provided at great cost to the people of this country an able tribunal to hear these cases. Parties in interest are duly challenged and notified to make known their minds and the state of facts respecting a question of great public interest, and the public as well as individuals have the right to require that the truth be fully told and not partially told. Therefore, require it to be told and compel them to tell it when they are summoned there.

ONLY SUCH EVIDENCE AS COULD NOT HAVE BEEN OBTAINED BY DUE DILIGENCE SHOULD BE HEARD BY THE COURTS.

Second. Require that no other evidence as to any rate fixed by the Commission shall be heard by any court in any subsequent proceeding saving only such as could not have been obtained by the reasonable diligence of the party offering the same prior to the final order in such case entered by the Commission. There would then be no danger of anybody being taken by surprise. There would be no danger of anybody being curtailed in right. There would be no danger of anybody being shorn of either legal or equitable remedy. Then, why not? That is due process of law, because it preserves in complete integrity, in unmaimed and in perfect stature, the complete right of a man to be heard both before the Commission of original investigation and to have his case heard again before a court of his country. That deprives him of the opportunity to do injustice in trifling with the laws by making an imperfect showing in the first place and exposing his full hand in the second. That is economical, in that it does not repeat the testimony and procedure, and it guards against the possibility of wrong by allowing out of grace the liberty to introduce any new testimony which could not in diligence have been obtained before.

A COPY OF THE RECORD BEFORE THE COMMISSION SHOULD ACCOMPANY THE BILL OR OTHER PROCESS IN COURT.

Third. Require, in the next place, that the copy of the record before the Commission, with all the testimony written and taken down from verbal recitation, shall be presented and made a part of the entire petition, whether you call it appeal, review, or bill to the upper court.

There, Mr. President, when you do that you have withheld one of the stimulants to interlocutory injunctions. If you file a bill in equity ordinarily to review some past procedure, you are not obliged to put the record of that procedure in your bill. You may put some affidavit of your own or any suggestive thing that you deem proper. The court will look upon the face of what you present. But if you require the complainant in the bill, appeal, or petition of review to put with his papers the full record of what was done before, you at least guard against a partial presentment of the case to the chancellor who will act upon it.

NOTICE OF APPLICATION FOR INJUNCTION.

Then, Mr. President, the suggestion by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] as to requiring that notice be given—five days is his suggestion—before any application for injunction is made would also be a just expedient and within the range of the proprieties of process to give the adverse party a full opportunity to do what might be necessary to defend his interests. And thus, Mr. President, you would reduce to a minimum the friction between two bodies, which ought to be made to work as nearly in affinity as the case may be and which should not be put in rival relations to each other. Thus, too, would be avoided the opportunities of turning down the Commission by new evidence purposely withheld from it and afterwards used in court to the unjust injury of its reputation and to the delay of justice.

These, Mr. President, are some of the suggestions which have occurred to my mind. They obviate, in a measure at least, the danger that might arise were Congress to withdraw a remedy now known and now practiced, ancient, based on sound principles, and in vogue in the courts, without substituting something equally substantial and less liable to abuse than it has proved to be.

Mr. President, I have finished discussing all that I care to discuss about this measure, except the single question what should be involved in the appeal or review before the court after the case has been dealt with by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I had also wished to show a little further the differentiation between this case and the manifold and multiplying cases of administrative law with which we are now dealing. I have, however, been speaking for over three hours, and, if not to my own exhaustion, I am pretty sure to the exhaustion of the patience of my auditors, and I would be very glad if I might be permitted to finish that part of my discussion to-morrow instead of to-day, unless perhaps I should transgress upon some other procedure that has been arranged for to-morrow's session. If not, I would ask this indulgence of the Senate.

NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 145) for appointment of members of Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. WARREN. The committee has considered the subject-matter of the point resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Charles M. Anderson, of Ohio; WILLIAM WARNER, of Missouri; Franklin Murphy, of New Jersey, and JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, be, and the same hereby are, appointed as members of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States; Charles M. Anderson, WILLIAM WARNER, and Franklin Murphy to succeed themselves, their terms of service expiring April 21, 1906; JAMES W. WADSWORTH to succeed Gen. Martin T. McMahon, deceased, whose term of office expires April 21, 1910.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. PENROSE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 2, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 1, 1906.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Lieut. Commander William L. Rodgers to be a commander in the Navy from the 7th day of January, 1906, vice Commander Lewis C. Heilner, promoted.

Paul J. Bean, a citizen of Texas, to be an assistant civil engineer in the Navy from the 27th day of April, 1906, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade on that date.

Lieut. Thomas J. Senn to be a lieutenant-commander in the Navy from the 7th day of January, 1906, vice Lieut. Commander William L. Rodgers, promoted.

PROMOTION IN THE ARMY—CAVALRY ARM.

First Lieut. Ben H. Dorcy, Fourth Cavalry, to be captain from April 26, 1906, vice Whitman, Thirteenth Cavalry, detailed as quartermaster.

POSTMASTERS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 1, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill, to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Indian appropriation bill, to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment to hear an explanation of the matter?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is hardly worth while to reserve it, but I will do it if the gentleman wishes to make a statement.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to inform the gentleman that I have consulted with the gentleman from Texas, the ranking minority member of the committee, and the course suggested is entirely agreeable to him. There are between two and three hundred amendments to the bill, and in the neighborhood of $3,000,000 is added, so that the gentleman from Mississippi sees that it will take some considerable time in conference, and the sooner we get it there the better.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. And I see no good could be gained by going into committee——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the objection, I will state to the gentleman from New York that I saw in the Washington Post the other day where a girl out in Arizona had been asleep for seven weeks and waked up, but when she found that the sleeping statehood bill in the conference committee beat her record she went back to sleep again. I shall object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of Senate bill 5572 from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. I have consulted with the chairman of that committee, and he makes no objection to the change.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move, if the gentleman so desires.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman from Mississippi objects, I shall simply do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman from Ohio had better move to save trouble.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to change the reference of Senate bill 5572 from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 5572. An act to amend section 4348 of the Revised Statutes establishing great coasting districts of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the reference to this bill be changed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18537—the agricultural appropriation bill.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There appears in this morning's Washington Post a report, purporting to be of yesterday's proceedings of the House, calculated to reflect upon me as a Member of this House and upon my standing as a Member of this House and upon the confidence that, as a Member of this House, the House should have in me, and which I am entitled to have. I beg the pardon of the House for taking up its time, but I feel somewhat grieved and aggrieved about it, and beg the indulgence of this honorable body.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the House ought to have the article in advance of stating any question of personal privilege.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am just fixing to read it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Send it to the desk.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It says, Mr. Speaker:

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee endeavored to be heard above the noise and confusion, Mr. WADSWORTH objecting to any further discussion of seeds under the paragraph relating to "animal industry." This angered the Tennesseean, and as he sat down, by command of the Chair, he managed to say that the bill was loaded with all kinds of appropriations to take care of and suppress the "mouth and foot disease, hollow horn, and hollow tail," but took away from the farmer the few seeds that he every year looked forward to receiving.

This new outburst of eloquence on the part of Mr. GAINES threw the House into convulsive laughter. When the Members had partially recovered their composure Mr. GAINES rushed down the aisle, carrying a mass of manuscript in both hands, holding it aloft, shouting that he had hundreds of letters from farmers favoring free seeds.

As Chairman WADSWORTH reached out his hand for them, Mr. GAINES laid them on a desk and began pulling from the bunch various documents. It developed that among these "hundreds" of letters there were an unusually large proportion of bills of various sorts and other "pub. docs." that had no relevancy to the seed question.

Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that no question of personal privilege has been suggested.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman wait until I get through, which will be in just a moment?

Mr. DALZELL. That article, I understand, is the basis of your——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose now that I say to the gentleman that I had a handful of letters from my constitutents, and it proved to be a handful of documents, would he not think I was imposing upon him and the House—flat-footedly deceiving him?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of course he would.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to show that I did have the letters—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I say that it affects my official standing in this House——

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, my point of order is that no question of personal privilege has been presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reads from the Manual:

A newspaper article in the nature of criticism of a Member's acts in the House does not present a question of personal privilege.

The Chair has listened to the reading of the article which the gentleman furnished him. In the opinion of the Chair it does not present a question of personal privilege.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes in which to explain the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for five minutes to address the House in the nature of a personal explanation. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thank the House for this courtesy. Mr. Speaker, I sent out early in the year all or about all the seeds that the Department said were to my credit. After I had done this I received a great number of letters many of which I have here, and had with me in my hands in the House yesterday, which many of you saw, from people in and out of my district, asking me to send them seeds. I have now a large bunch of these letters in one hand, which you see, and many more are here on my desk in large envelopes, compressed by rubbers, so that I could bring them up to the House again for the purpose of convincing the Members that the great masses, the plain people at least, not only want these seed, but have written to me for them. These same letters I had in my hand yesterday in the House when I requested the gentleman from Connecticut to permit me to read a paragraph from one of them, to prove to him that the people do appreciate these seed.

I was not addressing the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] as the Post claims when I held up these letters. The RECORD shows, as the fact was, I was addressing the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LILLEY]. I was standing very near him, near the middle aisle, some distance from where I now stand, when I asked the gentleman from Connecticut to permit me to read from one of these letters, I grabbed up in each hand, from the desk in front of me, a number of these letters and held them in my hand, showing to him and my brother Members that I had received these letters and actually had them with me to demonstrate that the people not only wanted these seed, but had actually written to me for them, as some of the Members say they have no requests for seeds. When the gentleman from Connecticut declined to yield further, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], came over to where I was standing, and to guy me, as the RECORD shows, he said:

You have a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and a copy of the Agricultural Report in your hands.

I was not aware that I had anything but these letters in my hands. I laid down the letters and examined them and found that underneath the letters in my hand was a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which I had accidentally picked up from the desk with the letters as I reached down with both hands to the desk in front of me where the letters were lying. In this way I had picked up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on which a bunch of my letters were lying. I had not picked up "an unusually large proportion of bills of various sort and other public documents that had no relevancy to the seed question," as the Post states. I had only those letters and this RECORD in my hand, which I had accidentally picked up, as just stated. I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to come and examine the letters, which he did not do. Others around me looked at them. I was acting in the utmost good faith, kept nothing concealed of which I had any knowledge, and everyone laughed—so did I—at the discovery the gentleman from New York made in finding the RECORD, as I have stated. But the manner in which the Post has reported this matter, however unintentionally it might have been done, does me great injustice, and hence I make this statement and shall now proceed to read some of these letters, to show that my constituents and others appreciate these seeds and actually wrote to me for them. I will read the first one lying before me, and as I come to them:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 8, 1906.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your kindness in sending me seed in years past prompts me again to ask you to remember me again this year, and have me placed on list for a few seed. Remember me as your supporter and admirer. Wishing you continued success in your high and honorable position.

Respectfully, yours,
L. X. NANCE,
Chief Operator, N. C. & St. L.

See list attached giving names of friends that you so kindly remembered last year:

Mrs. A. J. Nance, Sixth avenue, Nashville, Tenn.
Mrs. L. M. Nance, Lavergne, Tenn.
Mrs. W. P. Davis, Beckwith, Tenn.
Mrs. E. M. Davis, Beckwith, Tenn.
Mrs. M. D. Nance, Beckwith, Tenn.

Here is a letter, Mr. Speaker, from the United Charities of Nashville, dated January 12, from Miss Fanny Battle, a good woman, the daughter of General Battle, who helped to teach me my alphabet:

THE UNITED CHARITIES,
Nashville, Tenn., January 8, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR WESLEY: We were made very happy by your communication regarding the seeds for the very poor. In their name we most cordially thank you.

I am very proud of you as my friend and my neighbor boy and my schoolboy. Many prosperous years to you.

Your friend,
FANNY BATTLE, Secretary.

Here is another letter in which she writes:

THE UNITED CHARITIES,
Nashville, Tenn., January 12, 1906.

Hon. J. W. GAINES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR WESLEY: The seeds have arrived, and there is many a family in the factory districts here that will have cause to call you blessed. We, too, are very thankful that you have remembered them.

Yours, sincerely,
FANNY BATTLE, Secretary.

I wrote her to give them to the very poor, and she did it. "In their name we most cordially thank you," she says; and then she speaks kindly of me. I will not read that.

I read a letter, Mr. Speaker, from Miss Mary McNellis, of Nashville, asking me to send some flower seed for the benefit of the Old Woman's Home. I sent her letter to Secretary Wilson, and here is his reply:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., March 26, 1906.

Hon. J. W. GAINES,
House of Representatives.

SIR: As requested in your favor of the 23d instant, I have taken pleasure in directing that you be credited with ten additional packages of flower seed, which will be sent to Miss Mary McNellis, 315 Ninth avenue north, Nashville, Tenn., at an early date.

Very respectfully,
B. T. GALLOWAY, Chief of Bureau.

Here is another from Miss Mary Woods, of Nashville, asking to send them some seeds:

NASHVILLE, TENN., January 20, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Centennial Club I wish to thank you for the seeds and plants which came to us from the Agricultural Department as a response to your kind request. From your first letter in reply to one of mine you said you feared you could not get any more as we were late with our request, and when the plants came we were not only gratified but surprised.

We wish also to thank you for what you say in regard to Niagara. The whole nation would be grieved and mortified should such a magnificent spectacle be destroyed.

Very truly,
MARY WOODS, Secretary.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 16, 1906.

Hon. J. W. GAINES,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 12th instant, transmitting a letter from Miss Mary Woods, secretary of the Centennial Club, Nashville, Tenn., who asks for seeds, plants, etc., to beautify the children's gardens at Nashville. I have taken pleasure in directing that a collection of shrubs and also a supply of flower seed be forwarded to Miss Woods and trust the same will prove of service.

Very respectfully,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chief of Bureau.

Here is a leter from Rev. William M. Green, a preacher in the city of Nashville, asking me to send him some seed:

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 20, 1906.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES.

MY DEAR SIR: My little granddaughter asked: "Is Mr. GAINES still in Washington?" "Yes," I answered, "and working like a beaver." "Well, then," said she, "write to him that if he has any seeds left I would like to have some, and will be much obliged." So there you have it.

Would it not satisfy China if our Government should agree to permit 500 laborers to come over annually, and that we will not permit more than 500 of our laborers to go over there to settle permanently? Hope you are well and happy.

Yours, indeed,

WM. M. GREEN,
901 Villa Place.

Here is one from Hackberry, Tenn.; a good name, Mr. Speaker, showing that these seeds go where the hackberry bushes are, and where some of the yeomanry and good citizens of my State are. [Great laughter and applause.]

HACKBERRY, TENN., February 25, 1906.

JOHN W. GAINES,
United States Department of Agriculture.

SIR: We planted some of your seeds last year; it was the finest we ever had. We intend to plant some of them this year. You said please report the result of our trial to this Department.

Miss HULDAH LYLE.
Hackberry, Tenn.

I will read two from Mr. Parks, who has ridden all over the tobacco section of Tennessee and Kentucky fighting the tobacco trust:

PORT ROYAL, TENN., March 14, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: For a long time I have been looking for the garden seed to come to hand. They fail to come to hand. I am very much disappointed. Many of my lady friends are expecting them, and are after me almost daily about them, and that is why it bothers me for them not to come.

I have been over the country so much lately, and could have handed them out to my friends, and especially to those who are the least able to buy.

I inclose you a list of bulletins. Kindly have them sent to George D. Corbin, Greenbrier, R. F. D. 2, Robertson County. I want him to have a bulletin on grafting and budding. I want him to have all you can give him about the orchard. Kindly send Year Book. Will appreciate it if you will also send some bulletins to J. D. Sherer, Greenbrier, R. F. D. No. 2. Both are my friends, and will appreciate what you can do for them. They are anxious to learn all about the orchard.

I spent the night with Mr. Corbin last week. Mrs. Corbin fed me on canned Indian peaches, and I never ate better, and I want to do all in my power to help them.

I have lots of friends who have fed me through our great tobacco fight, and that is one of the main reasons I am so anxious about getting a big lot of seed of all kinds for them.

Your friend,

JNO. D. PARKS.

PORT ROYAL, TENN., April 16, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES.

MY DEAR SIR: Your valued favor of March 22 received, in which you quoted letter from the seed department, saying they were rushed and would send out seed in a week or ten days. They did not reach me until 10th of April, and they were appreciated by those who I gave them. I did not have half to give near all those who had been feeding me and my faithful little horse through our great tobacco fight so long. And now I am bothered no little for those who have been so faithful to me to be expecting something from me they need, and not be able to furnish them.

When I noticed 38,000,000 packages of seed would be subject to the order of Representatives for distribution, to begin in December, 1905, I felt encouraged to feel like I would make lots of my good lady friends feel like I was trying to help them, and especially show in efforts and actions I had appreciated what they had done for me. It just looks sometimes like I have made the greatest failure of any man. It just begins to look like it is no use to make any great effort beyond what I can do with my own hands, and you know it is a slow go to get things down to such a point as that. I will try and work and hope for better conditions in the near future.

I am, your friend,

JNO. D. PARKS.

Here is one from Antioch, near my old home:

ANTIOCH, TENN., March 1, 1906.

Mr. GAINES.

DEAR FRIEND: I got your free seed last year, and they did mighty well, and I thank you for them, and if you have any beet seed to give away I would be thankful if you would send me a paper of the blood turnip-beet seed. I haven't got any and can't get them; and if you have them, send a paper of four-o'clock seed. I am a poor old woman, and have one arm broken, and can't work to buy any seed. Send me the seed, if you please, and oblige a friend. If you send the seed, direct this way: Mrs. W. F. Jones, Antioch, Tenn., R. F. D. No. 16, and oblige a friend, Mrs. W. F. Jones, and if you have them to give away, please send them as soon as you can.

Note, gentlemen, that she says she is a widow and without money. "I am a poor old woman and have one arm broke and can't work to buy any seed." [Applause.] I didn't have any to send, gentlemen, but I asked Secretary Wilson to send them and wrote her the following letter:

MARCH 10, 1906.

Mrs. W. F. JONES,
R. F. D. No. 16, Antioch, Tenn.

DEAR MADAM: your letter of recent date to hand, and I regret to say that I am entirely out of both garden and flower seed. I have, however, written to the Department of Agriculture requesting them, if possible, to send you some seed, which I sincerely trust they can do.

Am sorry that your letter did not reach me before all of mine were mailed out.

With best wishes, I am, yours, very respectfully,

_____.

Here is another one from H. C. Singleton, of Nashville:

NASHVILLE, TENN., January 27, 1906.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, M. C., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As one of your constituents, I beg the privilege of requesting you to add my name to the list of those to whom you may send farm and garden seeds, especially the latter; also flower seeds, plants, etc. I would appreciate anything in this line you may be able to send me from time to time. With highest regards, I am,

Very respectfully, yours,

H. C. SINGLETON,
No. 955 Woodland street, Nashville, Tenn.

Here is one from one of the editors of the Nashville American, which the correspondent of that paper asked me to send him:

THE NASHVILLE AMERICAN,
Nashville, Tenn., January 5, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
Washington.

DEAR MR. GAINES: Many, many thanks in behalf of myself and Mrs. Ewing for the seeds.

I trust you will have a happy and prosperous year, and that you may not overwork yourself.

Very sincerely,

WM. J. EWING.

Here is one from W. A. Sears, of the Nashville Banner:

THE NASHVILLE BANNER,
Nashville, Tenn., January 22, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Will you kindly remember "the pauper" this year with a package of vegetable and flower seeds?

Very truly, yours,

W. A. SEARS,
Nashville Banner, Nashville, Tenn.

Here is one from Mrs. Eli Morris, a widow [applause]—the widow of one of my best friends, now dead and in heaven:

NASHVILLE, TENN., March 29, 1906.

MY DEAR MR. GAINES: Since writing my mother, Mrs. Elkin, so beautifully about "our" Eli, she wants me to ask you again to send her flower and garden seeds. Hoping you can do this without any inconvenience, and that you are well and happy, I am,

Sincerely,

Mrs. ELI MORRIS.

Miss Sue Ella Brown, Clarksville, Tenn., says:

Please send me a collection of seed. I have tried seed from the Department and they are very fine.

Mrs. J. W. Hagerwood, Sobel, Tenn., says:

The flower seed and other seeds you sent me last year proved very satisfactory. You asked me to let you know how I liked them. They all did just as nice as they could, garden seed and all. Please pardon me for not replying sooner, and please send me some more seed.

Prof. John S. Daniel, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., writes:

I shall thank you very much if you will have the Agricultural Department send me some nitro culture for alfalfa. I should like to get a small culture to test right away, and also a large culture to use on several bushels of seeds to plant 15 acres in March.

Mrs. Annie Castleman, Pollman avenue, Nashville, Tenn., says:

I thank you most heartily for those seed you sent me last year. They thrived and did fine.

She asks for more and some for her neighbors.

Mr. Henry F. Beaumont, Nashville, Tenn., asked me for some seed for his wife, and adds this:

Mrs. Beaumont wishes to have a good garden this year and she thinks Government seeds are the only kind that will produce the results she desires.

I have a great number of letters here asking for tobacco seed. I have another here from Mr. M. F. Bailey, Dover, Tenn.—Stewart County—who asked me for some rape seed. I sent the letter to the Department. He wanted 10 pounds for experimental purposes. I have here copies of my letter to Mr. Bailey and one to Secretary Wilson, asking that the seed be sent.

I haven't the time, Mr. Speaker, to read more of these letters. Here are a great number of them on my desk. Anyone may read them who desires. I had them with me yesterday; they are the same letters that I held in my hand when, by the accident, as stated, I picked up the RECORD with them.

You can see from this, gentlemen, the great injustice that this publication does me, and how it would tend, unexplained, to mislead the readers of the Post. I have nothing more to say, for the present, although I would like to read all these letters. [Loud applause.]

And now, by way of extension of my remarks, through the courtesy of the House, I will print a few of these letters:

CLARKSVILLE, TENN., February 21, 1906.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I want you to procure for me from the seed or Agricultural Department some tobacco seed of the Cuban or Brazilian type. I do not know the name of variety, but what I want is the largest leafiest variety of a tobacco that has that peculiar Havana flavor. Please guess at balance, and send me enough seed to sow 100 square yards.

Respectfully, ED. G. DUNLAVY.

SPRINGFIELD, ROBERTSON COUNTY, TENN.

Hon. J. W. GAINES: Please send me some one sucker tobacco seed, and some good type of some other kind.

Your friend, A. G. WILLIAMS, Farmer.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C. February 13, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have your favor of the 2d instant, inclosing a letter from Mr. A. G. Williams, R. F. D. 4, Springfield, Tenn., requesting some one-sucker tobacco seed.

We regret to say that we have no seed of this variety on hand for distribution, but have forwarded to Mr. Williams samples of some other varieties which we think well adapted to his locality.

Very respectfully,

B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chief of Bureau.

OFFICE OF J. S. DOWLEN & SON,
Springfield, Tenn., January 20, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter of some time since to hand; it got mislaid among some papers, hence I have not written you. If you have made no arrangements about the seed for our neighborhood, the post-office having been absorbed by rural deliveries, will make you this proposition: You send the seed to J. S. Dowlen & Son, and I will see that they are distributed among the different families. If you send any, send enough for 300 families, that none may be neglected.

Yours, very respectfully,

J. S. DOWLEN & SON,
By TONY DOWLEN.

Mr. J. W. GAINES: Please send garden seeds to the following names: A. B. Carpenter, F. A. Carpenter, Beverley Carpenter, Mollie Carpenter, P. G. Carpenter, M. J. Carpenter, Aubrey Mackey, Ella Mackey, Guthrie, Todd County, Ky., Route 5; Mrs. Florence M. Harris, R. W. Harris, Anderson Harris, Fred Harris, Frankie Harris, Trenton, Todd County, Ky., Route 3.

Hon. J. W. GAINES, M. C.

DEAR SIR: Please send me some garden seeds, and oblige,

Yours, faithfully,

WILTON SAWYER,
West Nashville, Tenn.

JANUARY 17, 1906.

Mr. WILTON SAWYER,
R. F. D. No. 5, West Nashville, Tenn.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of recent date just received, and I have requested the Department of Agriculture to send you the garden seed asked for.

Yours, very truly, ———— ————.

JANUARY 17, 1906.

Mr. B. T. GALLOWAY,
Chief of Bureau, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Please send one package of garden seed to Wilton Sawyer, R. F. D. No. 5, West Nashville, Tenn., box 70, using my franked slip herewith inclosed.

Yours, very respectfully, ———— ————.

JANUARY 12, 1906.

The honorable SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: Mr. Clay Burnell, Guthrie, Ky., wants some Alfaso de Cuba tobacco seed. Will you please send them to him, if in your power, using the inclosed franked slip.

I inclose you his letter of request, and ask you to return same.

Yours, very respectfully, ———— ————.

INDIAN MOUND, TENN., March 8, 1906.

Hon. JOHN W. GAINES, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please forward one package of garden seed, and oblige,

Yours, truly,

W. A. HALL.

CANEYSPRING, TENN., February 16.

Mr. JOHN GAINES.

DEAR SIR: I saw in the Weekly American your announcement about distribution of tobacco seed. I desire to plant some tobacco this year, and, if you please, send me a package just as soon as you can, for I am in a hurry to plant.

Sincerely, yours, L. D. POWELL.

GUTHRIE, KY., January 9, 1906.

Hon. JOHN WESLEY GAINES.

DEAR SIR: I want to ask a favor of you. I wish you would send me some Alfaro de Cuba tobacco seed. I want them to raise some smoking tobacco. Will give you some when you are at some of our tobacco meetings next fall, such as we had at Guthrie and Trenton, Ky.; so will close, wishing you success with your tobacco bill.

Very respectfully,

CLAY BAUME.

OFFICE OF DIEHL & LORD,
Nashville, Tenn., January 4, 1906.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: I would be pleased if you send William Kirkpatrick, 48 Green street; John Prinz, 67 Maury street, and Lorain McDanil, care of Diehl & Lord, some seeds; Joseph Kight, care of Diehl & Lord, some seeds. They will surely appreciate same. I wish you all the good luck you might wish yourself in the new year.

Yours, ADAM DIEHL.

DEEP SPRING, TENN., March 6, 1906.

JOHN WESLEY GAINES.

KIND SIR: Please send us some garden seed, and oblige Joe Griffin, Annie Griffin, W. R. Harper, M. G. Harper, all of Deep Spring, Cheatham County, Tenn.

Yours, truly, JOE GRIFFIN.

DEAR SIR: Please send one package tobacco seed to Mr. Ed G. Dunlang, R. R. No. 1, Clarksville, Tenn., using the inclosed franked slip.

Yours, very respectfully,

———— ————.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion of Mr. WADSWORTH was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. FOSTER of Vermont in the chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Plant Industry: To investigate fruits, fruit trees, grain, cotton, tobacco, vegetables, grasses, forage, drug, medicinal, poisonous, fiber, and other plants and plant industries, in cooperation with other branches of the Department, the State experiment stations, and practical farmers; to study plant and orchard diseases and demonstrate the treatment of same; to study plant physiology in relation to crop production and the origination and improvement of crops by breeding and selection; to investigate and encourage the adoption of improved methods of farm management and farm practice; to investigate the feeding value of farm crops and the use of fertilizers; to investigate the causes of decay in forest timber and timber used for construction purposes, and to devise means for preventing the decay of the same; to investigate the practical application in agriculture of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by bacteria and other micro-organisms in soils and in the root tubercles of leguminous and other plants; to cultivate and distribute these nitrogen fixers; to study and find methods for preventing algal and other contaminations of water supplies; to carry on special investigations of the conditions of grain production, handling, grading, and transit, and of the means of improving the same; to model fruits, vegetables, and other plants, and furnish duplicate models to the experiment stations of the several States, as far as found practicable; to investigate the methods of harvesting, packing, storing, and shipping fruits and vegetables, and for experimental shipments of fruits and vegetables within the United States and to foreign countries; and such fruits, vegetables, packages, and packing materials as are needed for these investigations and experimental shipments may be bought in open market and disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and he is authorized to apply the moneys received from the sales of such fruits, vegetables, and materials toward the continuation and repetition of these investigations and experimental shipments, and such moneys shall be available until used; to cultivate and care for experimental gardens and grounds, manage and maintain conservatories, greenhouses, and plant and fruit propagating houses; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to continue the necessary improvements to establish and maintain a general experimental farm and agricultural station on the Arlington estate, in the State of Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act of Congress approved April 18, 1900; to investigate and report on the cost of making tea and the best method of cultivating and preparing the same for market; to investigate and develop the domestic production of sugar-beet seed and the best methods of increasing the tonnage of sugar beets; to continue inquiry and ascertain the progress made in the production of domestic sugar from beets and sorghum and other sugar-producing plants; to collect, purchase, propagate, test, and experiment with rare new seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; for the employment of investigators, local and special agents, agricultural explorers, experts, clerks, illustrators, assistants, student or scientific aids, foremen, gardeners, merchants, and all other labor and scientific assistance required in conducting investigations and experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere. And the employees of the Bureau of Plant Industry outside of the city of Washington may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leaves of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year, which leave may, in exceptional and meritorious cases where such an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed fifteen days additional in any one year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against all after the word "countries," in line 9, page 19, down to and including the word "used," in line 17 of the same page, on the ground that it changes existing law. The provision relates to the expenditure of the appropriation which the paragraph carries. There is no legislation authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to go into the markets of the country for the purpose of buying fruits to pack and ship to other markets in this country or to foreign countries, and authorizing him to make sales in any of the markets of the world and to use the proceeds of those sales for a repetition of the transaction. There are abundant provisions in the paragraph authorizing the investigation of the art of packing and shipping fruit. My point of order applies only to that provision which directs the Secretary of Agriculture to buy fruits and farm products for the purpose of shipment into domestic and foreign markets, and to use the proceeds for the repetition of the transaction. There is no law authorizing it. It is no part of agriculture within the meaning of the statutes. It is necessarily and essentially a part of commerce. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order ought to be sustained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is conceded by the chairman of the committee, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to a typographical error in the second word of line 25, on page 18. It should be spelled "algæ" instead of "algal."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Change the spelling of the second word in line 25, page 18, so that it will read "algæ."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will make the correction.

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like recognition at this time for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I listened yesterday with considerable interest to the fervid and sometimes rather hysterical eloquence of the gentlemen who were rushing in rapid procession to express allegiance to the interests of the farmers and the men who toil; and, incidentally, to express their appreciation of the work of this Department. Now, gentlemen, I realize that the period of nominating conventions is at hand, and therefore I trust that all the remarks of all the gentlemen may be as seed sown in good ground; that they may bring forth fruit, and that the results may abundantly justify the expectation at the time of harvest.

I yield to no man in my regard for the agricultural industries of this country—the great forces that are making for national prosperity. These gentlemen do not say anything on behalf of those interests in general, that I would not say if I could. But I am bound to take issue with them on some of the conclusions that they draw. I recognize as thoroughly as they do that agriculture is the great primary source of productive wealth. I recognize more, that its prosperity is the necessary and essential condition of national prosperity, advancement, and growth. I recall that the classic and Chinese mythologies gave to agriculture a divine origin, and that, in order further to dignify the subject, they brought from the heavens a god to teach its mysteries to mankind. I am inclined to think, however, that our latter-day, twentieth century, practical point of view gives even more distinct recognition, when it devotes to the study of agricultural problems, as it does, this body of trained scientists who for the last twelve years have been shedding so much luster on the Department of Agriculture and giving so much of reputation and distinction to it.

I believe in the Department of Agriculture. I believe thoroughly in its work. I believe in its great Secretary, who started it on its career of advancement and growth and who for nearly ten years has so ably directed its progress. I believe in the men who are under Secretary Wilson, the able heads of departments, and in the faithful and energetic men who are working under them. The work fascinates me. It appeals to me. It appeals to my imagination. It appeals to my hopes of the future of this country. It appeals to my sense of duty to the people, and the constituents whom I have the honor to represent. I am not afraid of the man with the hoe, and I have no fears of the militant farmer. I am not alarmed at the size of these appropriations. They seem very small, comparatively, entirely reasonable, and abundantly justified by the work the Department has been doing.

Without going too much into detail, I should like to call the attention of the committee briefly to a few of the results of this work before saying anything on this question of free garden seeds which we are discussing.

THE AMERICAN PEOPLE AND THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The American farmer is by no means a babe in swaddling clothes. Given a fair start and an open field he can take care of himself; but his work can be vastly facilitated, his efficiency tremendously increased, and the highest interests of every citizen of the country promoted by the guidance, suggestion, and helpful advice of such bureaus as have been established in the last twelve years.

It was Mark Twain who said that the cauliflower was a cabbage with a college education, and it has been the function of the national Department of Agriculture to give college educations not only to the cabbage, but to the orange and the sugar beet, the wheat of Minnesota and the tobacco of Connecticut, to the cotton of Texas and the apple of New York and Michigan, to the horses of the mountains and the dairy cows of Iowa. True, they say that the Department reeks with paternalism, but there is paternalism and paternalism, and there is nothing in the helpful work of these bureaus which would disturb the shades even of Jefferson.

I wish it had been in the power of every member of this House to listen to the statements made before the committee by the heads of the various executive branches of the Department. Failing in that, I wish that each might find time to read the reports of these hearings. They are a liberal education in applied science in the field of agriculture, and if anyone has had the bad taste to recall the earlier designation of the Department in semi-derision as the "cow bureau," I think he will be heartily ashamed of it before he gets through with his studies. The work is not only theoretical, and it is not purely educational, although it is, and should be in the main, experimental and suggestive. It is distinctly practical and is more than justified by direct returns.

There is not one field of governmental activity where a dollar spent brings a tenth of the return in actual good to the people that does the little expenditure which we give, more or less grudgingly, to this Department. It covers a wide field in national life, and in every line of its activities it demonstrates every year in a cold matter of dollars and cents its increasing financial importance.

THE WORK OF THE SEVERAL BUREAUS.

The Weather Bureau saves in a month, in the spring floods many times its entire cost since its institution, in the saving of property and life, and its researches in the field of meteorological science are both wonderful and fascinating.

If the Bureau of Animal Industry had done nothing else in its whole career but to save the domestic animals of the country from the scourge of the hoof-and-mouth disease, it would have abundantly justified every dollar that it has cost, but that is only one small portion of its work. Its daily routine is made up of the protection of the people's food supply—increasing its volume and decreasing its cost; protecting the farmer and stock grower from diseases and adding enormously to our national wealth. It has done, and is doing, in its meat-inspection work perhaps more than any one single agency to develop and hold a foreign market for our agricultural productions, and our meats to-day find an entrance into Germany, France, Belgium, and other European centers solely because they are viséed by this Bureau.

The Department has recently taken over the immense forests on our public lands, and forested areas to-day aggregating more than 100,000,000 acres are being cared for, preserved, and developed by the Department of Agriculture. While there is a possibility for difference of opinion as to the wisdom of some phases of this work, its importance and its possibilities of good in the preservation of the forest and the conservation of the water supply, in the development of the arid regions, and the making possible of steady and successful irrigation are absolutely beyond computation; and the tact and skill with which this work has been done under its present management has gone far toward removing any possible ground for complaint.

THE EXPERIMENT STATIONS.

It is useless to enumerate in detail the individual bureaus with their almost spectacular work, but while we are talking of dollars and cents let us bear in mind that the experiment stations in all the States and Territories have cost the Government until now only $790,000 a year, and the additional work in connection with the stations in Washington increases these figures by only $200,000. That is a large sum of money, but a Minnesota experiment station alone has added more than this sum per annum to the value of the wheat crop of the country, by improving the type and character of the wheat grown. Figures are dry and meaningless things in the abstract, but in the concrete they tell their story.

The addition of a single kernel of wheat per head means an addition of more than $5,000,000 per annum to our national wealth, and the methods of seed selection introduced and practiced by these experiment stations have far more than equaled this increase.

We are spending about $30,000,000 in building vast reservoirs, canals, monumental dams, and structures, which we hope shall last to the end of time, to conserve and preserve the waters in the semiarid regions. We are doing this through the agency of trained and technical engineers whose work is exciting the admiration of every beholder. A hundred thousand dollars hardly pays for the reconnoissance for oné of the gigantic projects undertaken by the national Reclamation Service; but the Reclamation Bureau spends not one cent of its millions in solving, or attempting to solve, any of the myriad questions relating to the application of water to the soil, relating to irrigation as an art, relating to the economic use of the water it has cost these millions to save.

It remains for one of the bureaus of the Office of Experiment Stations, with a sum of only $102,000 altogether, to work along these lines and to achieve results which the western farmer regards as the most important of anything connected with the work of reclamation. There is no part of the work of the Department that meets with readier welcome at the hands of those for whom it is done than does this work of the Bureau of Irrigation and Drainage Investigation, and yet with this $102,000 that has been given to this Bureau there is to be carried on not only the irrigation work, but drainage development and experimentation in twenty States and the reclamation of millions of acres of land rendered useless by alkali and similar mineral elements.

I am very glad that the bill before us carries about $27,000 increase for this work.

With a total expenditure of less than $5,000 the Department last year located and detected the poison that, under the name of "loco," has cost the stockmen of this country, speaking conservatively, $10,000,000, and this was done although scientist after scientist, and expert after expert had declared the poison a myth.

THE BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY—ITS GREAT AND INCREASING IMPORTANCE.

No one of all these phases of this work is more beneficial than is that of the particular Bureau which we have under contemplation in this item—the Bureau of Plant Industry. None is more ably officered and directed. It costs, according to the figures of this bill, about $575,000. That is the equivalent in cost, of a thousand rounds of ammunition for a 12-inch gun, and the results of the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry simply can not be computed. These results are not only a benefit to the rural population, not only to the men for whom we plead so earnestly, but they are a benefit to the whole people; they increase our food supply; they promote our commerce; they help our people in every particular.

FREE GARDEN SEEDS—A USELESS AND UNJUSTIFIABLE PERVERSION OF ITS ORIGINAL WORK.

Because they are so far-reaching, and because they are so beneficent and important, I protest against men of the character and caliber of those who are at the head of this department having their time, energies, and opportunities frittered away in sending out these absurd little donations of ordinary garden seeds to the farmer—to men who do not want them and in many cases do not use them. I do not want this important work interfered with. I do not want this great bureau to continue under our direction doing something that seems to me ignoble and unworthy—unworthy of the Congress, unworthy the Department of Agriculture, and, most of all, unworthy the American farmer.

I do not think the committee intended to take anything from the farmer. I know that I did not. I do not believe that that was the thought at all. What we wanted to do was to substitute something that was of value for something that was unimportant and inconsiderable; something that really amounted to something, that would accomplish something, and was of practical utility for something of doubtful propriety which did little or no good.

When the Department was first organized, Congress very aptly and very properly made a part of its duty the distribution of rare and valuable seeds, but they were to be rare and valuable seeds, not the kinds that had been known for three centuries; not the variety that our forbears brought with them to Jamestown and Plymouth. They were to be rare and valuable seeds; something that would add to the productive power and wealth of the country and advance the interest of the farming population.

What the committee, if I understand it, attempted to do is simply this: they attempted to confine this work to the legitimate field of the distribution of rare and valuable seeds. There was no thought, I am sure, of dealing either illiberally or parsimoniously with it. On the other hand, they believe that they have appropriated sufficiently so that that work may be carried on with success according to its legitimate purpose.

WHAT THE SEED DISTRIBUTION SHOULD BE.

There are endless instances of the importance of the distribution if properly directed. The seedless orange was developed and introduced by the Bureau of Plant Industry, and afterwards distributed through this very appropriation. This one fruit has been worth more to the people of this country than all the radishes, pumpkins, lettuce, and beans that have been sent out through the Department of Agriculture since this distribution began. The statisticians tell us that the California crop of seedless orange alone is worth from $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 annually.

In the same way and through the same distribution the Government has been sending out macaroni wheat. The Bureau of Plant Industry introduced it from Russia and Asia and distributed it freely to our farmers, and to-day it is adding to the income-bearing possibilities of the country infinitely more than all of these ordinary seeds that they are sending out for us under our franks. This is something the farmer can not get at the corner grocery, and the cash value of the work is to be figured in millions of dollars. Last year it is estimated that we produced in this country from $10,000,000 to $15,000,000 in this product alone, and the beauty of it is that it fills a new field and positively adds that amount to our productive wealth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And they have done that within the last three years.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. And the chairman calls my attention to the fact that this work has all been done within the last three years. The same thing is true of the Kaffir corn, emmer, and brome. Those are things that are of real value, and they are sent out under the appropriation for the Congressional free-seed distribution, but they are not the ordinary garden seeds that you can buy anywhere for 1 or 2 cents a package.

I was much interested yesterday in the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. ELLERBE]. They seemed to be very apt, very sound, and very sensible. What he said about the wilt-resisting cotton is all true. It has added enormously to the receipts of the cotton growing States and the cotton growing section has not yet begun to reap the full returns, but I did not notice any plea for free beans in the gentleman's remarks or any argument for rhubarb or radishes or anything of that sort. All that the gentleman said was the strongest possible argument for the work of the Department in sending out rare seeds and against the garden seeds.

The wilt-resisting cotton was a rare and valuable thing that was developed by the Bureau and sent out under this form of seed distribution. Now, the committee has attempted still to provide for the rare and valuable plants and seeds. There is no disposition to leave out the wilt-resisting cotton, there is no disposition to leave out the further production of the seedless orange, or the Kaffir corn, or the macaroni wheat. There will be an amendment offered by the committee that will make that matter thoroughly clear, and will secure the continuance of the work without any restrictions. What the committee attempted to do was to leave in the bill all the appropriation that hitherto had been devoted to the rare and valuable seeds, and to eliminate and leave out of the bill this indefensible donation of no value which is, in many cases, regarded with ridicule, and justly so, by the very men to whom it is sent.

There is an ample field for work with rare seeds and plants. There are hundreds of localities all over the world where we still can get just such plants as those which this Bureau has been finding for us in the last years. The scientists from the Department are now searching in Asia, in Turkey, in India, in Africa, in northern Russia, and in Australia, and from those sections we are getting things that our farmers can use and render available from one end of this country to the other. It is true that many of them are semi-tropical and will interest mainly the South, like the orange, the mango, the fig, the grape fruit, and date, but it is also true that many of them are hardy and will interest the North, like the hardier kind of wheat, and the hardy crops that will grow clear to the Canada line and in altitudes of 6,000 or 7,000 feet—grains and fruits from Siberia and northern Russia, which thrive wonderfully well when brought to our warmer sections. That is the kind of work I plead for and have interest in.

We expend something like $500,000 a year in one single drug—opium—and we import that from foreign countries. Our total importation of foreign drugs and medicinal plants amounts to more than $5,000,000 annually.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Colorado may be permitted to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the gentleman is discussing the seed proposition. I would like to know if we have reached that provision in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes; we have.

Mr. FINLEY. Then I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

THE WORK IN CONNECTION WITH CERTAIN RARE PLANTS.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall take only a few minutes, for I shall very briefly conclude with one or two things to which I want to call attention. As I was saying, we are expending $500,000 a year for a single drug. That drug and many others can be grown with profit, and great profit, in many localities—some in Maine, in New Hampshire, in Vermont, and in the Northern States—others in other places. Crops like these can be made a kind of by-product to the farmer and ought to be introduced, and this Department is trying to do it through this Bureau. Now, the committee proposes to extend the usefulness of the Bureau along those lines and to substitute in its distribution digitalis and stramonium and plants like those for peas and beans and such plants as you can get anywhere. Only last week there was a very apt illustration of what I am saying. There is one concern engaged in the manufacture of celluloid in this country that pays $500,000 a year for camphor. Camphor, as we all know, is a monopoly of the Japanese Government in the island of Formosa. Probably the other uses of camphor in this country amount to about $2,000,000 a year.

Last year down in Florida one of the experts of this Department, in going around found a man who was trimming some ornamental camphor trees. He got the clippings from those trees and experimented with them in the Bureau. He found that he could get a higher content of camphor oil and a better quality of camphor than they could in Formosa, where they cut down and kill the tree. He further found that large tracts of land in Florida which were comparatively valueless for other purposes were admirably adapted for growing these trees. He went immediately to the celluloid people, showed them the result of his work, and explained to them the possibility of introducing the growth of them into this country, and last week they concluded the purchase of lands in Florida for the investment of $150,000 in the growing of American camphor. How does that work compare with our donations of 2-cent packages of cabbage and rhubarb and rutabaga?

We pay $500,000 a year to Germany and France for our beet-sugar seed. The Department of Agriculture is developing a beet-sugar seed to-day in this country that is superior in saccharine content, in hardiness and availability to anything that the Germans or French can produce; and I prefer to see my Colorado farmers get this improved sugar-beet seed rather than these common seeds that they do not want, and I know my Michigan and Utah and Minnesota friends feel the same way. I believe that Department can help the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] to find some rare seeds of this sort, that his people will think just as much of as they do of the peas and beans which he says they prize so highly, and if he does he will accomplish a substantial result in developing new agricultural possibilities for his section.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MUDD], and I do not believe that he got at the real point of this situation in his remarks yesterday. Shortly after I was first elected to Congress and before I knew some of the mysteries of the work of a Congressman which I have since learned, I was awakened in the dead vast and middle of night by a telegram from a very enthusiastic rural constituent, and it read like this:

Send seeds at once; no Republican seeds in this county.

I complied with that urgent demand as soon as I could, and the returns at the succeeding election, in the Republican crop, were amply satisfactory and highly commendable from my point of view. My enthusiastic rural friend had gotten at the real gist of this question. It is an attempt to secure a little, petty, unworthy, ignoble influence for ourselves as Congressmen in a way that we ought to be ashamed of, and it is a way that I hope will be abandoned.

The American farmer is not a babe in swaddling clothes. He can see through this little gift very easily. The man with the hoe is not what he was, even when Millet painted him or when Markham maligned him into fame. In America he is not only a tiller of the soil; he is a mechanic, manufacturer, and business man, and in these later days he is a chemist, physicist, bacteriologist, and entomologist as well. I think he understands and values this 2-cent contribution at its real worth.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Here is a publication I have which reads, "Free seeds; a few current editorials commenting on the Congressional free-seed distribution," and several editorials from different newspapers, and on the back of it it is stated: "Compiled by William Wolff Smith, newspaper correspondent, Washington, D. C." Who paid for that composition?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I am sure I do not know, and it does not interest me.

Mr. JAMES. The Agricultural Committee did not.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. No, sir.

Mr. JAMES. Do you not know it is true that seed houses that are attempting to create a trust in seeds, who are exerting their influence to keep the Government from giving seeds to the farmers, met and contributed money to get that writer to collate these editorials and send this out for the benefit of Congress?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I do not, and I do not care. What I want is that the Department shall confine itself to its legitimate work. The gentleman from Kentucky is no more anxious than I am that every farming industry shall be protected and every farmer shall get the full measure of proper support that he should. It is only the kind of help, it is only the kind of seed, it is only the kind of donation that the gentleman from Kentucky and I take issue upon. I would rather send to his constituents and mine the rare and valuable seeds, and the rare and valuable clippings—something that will add something to the wealth of the country, rather than follow this old rut in which we have been going.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does the gentleman feel that there ought to be some agonizing fear on the part of Congressmen where there are perhaps five or six or eight or ten millions of people who raise garden seed that they would get them all into a trust so as to oppress us?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I never have felt that fear.

Mr. GROSVENOR. When every fellow is producing his own garden seed, do you think there is danger of somebody getting it all and——

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. No; I have no fear of any such trust, and do not think the facts warrant it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then I feel relieved from that.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I was not saying anything in the direction of trust, but I am glad the gentleman is relieved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I now feel better.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I understand. No; I do not think this is a question of the overshadowing power of any seed trust. It is a question of plain common sense between common-sense Congressmen and common-sense farmers.

I want to make myself entirely clear, and, at the risk of repetition, let me repeat that I believe in proper and legitimate seed distribution. It is only the kind of seeds that I object to. I do not and can not believe that the sending out of ordinary garden seeds is a proper or legitimate distribution, and I shall oppose it. I will, however, vote any reasonable sum for the work of sending out new, rare, and valuable seeds and plants, and believe this would result in great good in the future, as it has in the past.

For work such as I have described in some twenty bureaus we provide this year $7,250,000. It reclaims our land; it renders fertile our exhausted reaches; it improves our crops; it increases, cheapens, improves, and diversifies the food supplies of our toiling millions; it protects our forests, our flocks, and our herds; it increases by billions of dollars annually our foreign and domestic commerce; it furnishes the most wholesome, safest, and most elevating form of employment to the people; it injures no one; it is beneficent, helpful, and unobtrusive. Its total cost represents an expenditure of a million dollars a day for the days of a single week. For the arts of war, including therein, as we properly should, our pension budget, we spent this year, in round numbers, a million dollars a day for the days of a whole year, and I venture to say that no man on the floor of this House will begin to compare the usefulness, beneficence, and far-reaching results of the work of the Department of Agriculture with that of our Army and Navy combined.

I join with our friends of the Military and Naval Committees heartily, cheerfully, and enthusiastically in every effort that they make to protect this country at home and abroad, to advance its prestige, to make its name and its flag honored, respected, and revered; I yield to no one in my support of everything which makes for our national honor and advantage; I will vote battle ships as long as there is a real need. The scare head of rampant militarism has no terrors for me, but in the name of the thirty millions of farming population who make up the great producing element of our body politic I protest against any cheeseparing or restrictive economies as applied to the work of this Department. We talk about the stupendous balance of trade in our favor. On this side of the Chamber we point with pride, and justly point with pride, to an aggregate balance for the ten years of Republican ascendance amounting to something like $4,000,000,000, but we should go further and pay our respects and distinguished consideration to the farmers of this country who have not only made that balance possible, but in order to do so have wiped out an adverse balance against us for the same period of over $890,000,000.

As the work grows it is necessary that comparatively new fields from time to time be entered upon, and this bill and the two previous bills have carried one item in itself somewhat novel, of which I wish to speak very briefly. In 1904 we appropriated $25,000 for experiments in animal feeding and breeding. The appropriation was continued last year, and it is carried in the bill before us. Under that appropriation, small and meager as it is, the Department has inaugurated two small experiments in the developing of an American type of horse, one in the East and one in the West; has made instructive and valuable experiments in sheep breeding in cooperation with the Iowa station; has already done a great work in the development of the poultry industry, which, although tremendous in its returns, has never received the attention it deserved; has been carrying on a series of most valuable and interesting experiments in calorimetric tests of the heat and flesh producing value of different food elements in connection with the Pennsylvania experiment station, and in several places in the South has started, or has under contemplation, similar work in feeding and breeding.

The field that this work opens upon is vast and important and has been hitherto almost neglected by the Government. We have lagged far behind the work of the other leading powers. We spend annually hundreds of thousands of dollars in importing foreign stock. Our horses, with the exception of two strains of trotting stock, which are really families rather than types, are Percheron, Belgian, Oldenburg, and Clydesdale; our cattle are Holsteins, Ayrshires, Swiss, Jerseys, or Herefords; our sheep are Cotswolds, Southdowns, and Merinos, and our swine are foreign in their origin and names; only two breeds of chickens proudly flaunt an American name and are the result of American breeding. It is high time that the genius and energy of the American breeder should be turned to the growth and development of native strains and American subject.

FOREIGN WORK IN HORSE BREEDING.

We frequently hear how one or another phase of modern progress is due in some direct or indirect manner to the Corsican first emperor of the French.

It is interesting to know that the great Hungarian breeding stable at Lipitza was started by an Arabian stallion captured from Napoleon at the battle of Leipsic. With that beginning the Austro-Hungarian Government has gradually developed, until to-day it spends over $800,000 a year in the maintenance of its horse-breeding establishments, with immense advantage to the individual horse breeders and without any encroachment upon or interference with individual enterprises. There is a single breeding station—Mezöhegyes—extending over 50,000 acres, which employs 6,000 civil and military employees and obtains the finest breeding stock available in the markets of the world; and to-day the Imperial Government makes no more proper or beneficial use of its funds.

One of the Austrian royal stables at Kis Ber was headed by an old-time English thoroughbred, "Buccaneer." The winner of the Derby and the winner of the Grand Prix in 1876 both came from this stable, and the descendants of Buccaneer from this stable had won in 1902 $1,100,000, in prizes.

After the fall of the second Empire the French found their agricultural industries terribly crippled, and none more than their breeding of horses, caused largely by the terrible losses suffered in the Franco-Prussian war. The French department of agriculture under the law of 1874 immediately took up this work with tremendous activity, and it has grown to such an extent that the budget of 1902, the last figures obtainable, carried an appropriation of $1,600,000 for horse-breeding stations, and no one, to my knowledge, has suggested that the French were other than frugal, careful, and businesslike in their governmental expenses. The work is a fixture in French system and has demonstrated its great and increasing value.

The Prussian Government spent in 1900 a quarter of a million dollars, and that is for Prussia alone. The Grand Duchy of Oldenburg for a hundred years has been growing and developing a strain of coach horses, until the name of Oldenburg is known, not for any statesmanship nor for military prowess, but for the excellence of its horses, from Australia to Siberia, from Germany to Japan, and from Lapland to Cape Town and back.

With all their lack of initiative and sluggishness in many regards, the Russian Government spends nearly a million dollars a year in its breeding of remounts and domestic horses.

The Italian budget for 1900 carried nearly $100,000. In 1904 the Government embarked upon a much more extensive scheme and, in addition to its previous work, in round numbers, $50,000 was devoted to the purchase of new animals, about as much for prizes and subsidies to different organizations of breeders, $50,000 for veterinary surgeons, and corresponding amounts for other purposes. Not long ago the Italian Government paid $17,000 for a Derby winner to put in one of its breeding establishments. The people are much interested and regard the work with marked approbation.

The English Government, through prizes and subsidies, spends about $30,000 a year, and its lack of initiative in this work is the subject of general regret. For many years the royal commission appointed to investigate the subject has pleaded with Parliament for larger appropriations and has pointed out the fact that the English were falling behind the other countries in this work. Some of the Canadian provinces have just started, and the press reports a few days ago contained an item that $25,000 had been paid for a single horse to start a stable at Truro, Nova Scotia.

We have invested, all told, a little over $10,000 in horses, and the State of Colorado, where the experiment was first tried, added almost as much for stables and similar expenditures connected with the work. We have to-day the beginning of an experiment which competent judges consider of the greatest promise. There is no field to which the American farmer can more safely direct his energies with greater hope and certainty of return than the breeding of fine horses; and there is no place in which the Government can more properly and more effectively render him assistance than by putting the work on a systematic and scientific basis. I do not mean breeding racing horses alone, but an average horse of superior speed, courage, strength, and endurance, which is demanded in increasing numbers by our domestic trade and by the foreign markets; of the kind, for which there is a constantly increasing demand and relatively decreasing supply.

The cost of carriage horses has increased in this country since 1891 in the average sum of over $100. The same fact is observed elsewhere. The export value is given now at $308, as against $174 then. In 1900, and the year was by no means extraordinary, Germany imported 90,000 horses, and for years Germany has spent from $17,000,000 to $20,000,000 abroad for horses annually. England in the ten years from 1891 to 1900 purchased abroad 342,000 horses, at a total cost of about $100,000,000, and the demand is steadily growing. France, on the other hand, from its greater breeding facilities, had large numbers to sell.

THE AMERICAN PLAN.

As I understand it, it is not proposed to imitate the Italian or Austrian systems, with their tremendous establishments of government-owned horses, but rather, with small national expenditure, to direct and assist cooperative circles of breeders, looking to the establishment of an available native type and to raising the general average of excellence of the American road stock.

Rather something more or less resembling the French system, which is essentially cooperative breeding under Government supervision. The expenditure is large, but the returns are proportionately even larger. As long ago as 1887, with a yearly maintenance charge and expenses for renewals and new stock amounting to some 1,400,000 francs, there was an income to the State, outside of sales, of 815,000 francs, and the statistics show that if this were the primary object, the returns could have been largely increased.

The real benefit has been the widespread general improvement in the common stock—the half-breeds, the work horse, and the ordinary driving horses—exactly the field in which we have done very little systematic work. What France and Hungary and the Grand Duchy of Oldenburg have done we certainly can, and should do.

At first the American breeders were inclined to look with some question upon this venture, but as it has begun to work itself out it now meets with almost universal approval, and I believe that a few years will demonstrate that this is one of the wisest ventures that the Department has undertaken. Similar work in the improvement of strains of dairy and beef cattle, swine and poultry and sheep, instituted in response to a very general request and demand, shows the importance of the work undertaken.

GENERAL IMPORTANCE OF THE WORK—MODERN PROBLEMS.

I have devoted considerable attention to the work of two particular bureaus, not because they excel the work of the other bureaus, but because of the particular interest which attaches to their work at the present time. The whole Department of Agriculture is serving the people in a most admirable way. There is no other form of governmental activity that should receive a more liberal degree of support at the hands of Congress than does the Department of Agriculture.

There is every reason why that should be so. The latter-day problems which are pressing on this country for solution are almost without exception problems which come from, and are the result of a change of the type of development over great areas of this country. A change from an essentially rural and agricultural type to an essentially industrial and manufacturing type. We view with alarm the great and disproportionate growth of our industrial centers. We view with alarm the influx of alien hordes, the growth of socialistic ideas, the growing urban discontent and the strife of wage-earners and the masses. We regret and deplore the drift from the country to the city, the passing of the saner forms of rural life, the simpler mode of living which characterized generations that have gone, and thus far we have only deplored and only viewed with regret. We have not done one single thing for a remedy.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the remedy, if remedy there exists, in my judgment, lies along the very line on which the Department of Agriculture is working. It lies in making the work of the American farmer more elevating, more pleasant, more attractive and more profitable. It lies in bringing his occupation to a proper plane of dignity, in recognizing the importance of his pursuit as a profession as well as a means of livelihood. It lies in teaching young men they can devote to this work just as much intelligent preparation, just as much thoughtful earnestness, just as much ability, as to railroad problems or finance or any other form of industry that occupies the human mind. It lies in keeping the young men on the farms and preventing their crowding into the less desirable, but apparently more attractive occupations.

And we can best do this, gentlemen, by liberally and generously supporting these men, who for years, without flourish of trumpets and without any accessories of military parade, have quietly, but with an efficiency equaled by no other similar body of men in the world, been bringing before the farmers of this country the richest fruit of all the ages and the highest results of scientific investigation when applied to the field of agricultural science, and we can not do it by this petty little distribution of free garden seed. [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words; and I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD] moves to strike out the last two words, and asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, somewhere in an old book that I have read there is a statement that "Unto him who hath much shall be given, but from him who hath little shall be taken even that which he hath." It seems to me that to-day some of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber are endeavoring to make true that old statement. There are gentlemen who come here and attempt to give much unto him who already hath much. You come here and you give unto the steel combination, to the watch trust, and to the beef and sugar monopolies; you give unto these; you protect them by your high protective tariffs; you protect many special industries—you give unto him who hath much. But now from the farmer—him who hath little—you are striving to take even that which he hath; you are striving to take even that which hath been given to him in past years. [Applause on Democratic side.]

You are complaining about the passage of this one little item; you are refusing to give the farmer the miserable little $100,000 or $200,000 for these free seed. Why, it is a mere bagatelle. Why this economy on this point, and why do you not exercise economy in a vast number of other ways where your extravagance runs riot? We have just passed the post-office bill, carrying one hundred and ninety-odd millions, with subsidies contained therein of larger sums than this; we are about to pass the naval bill, carrying one hundred millions, in round numbers. This Congress will appropriate more than a billion dollars, yet you seek to take out this little item which is meant for the benefit of the farmer. Why, sir, of all the industries where economy should be practiced this is the last of all the Departments of our Government whose appropriations you should in justice cut; this Department should be the last, because it is vastly the most important.

You must remember that 70 per cent of our people live in the country and but 30 per cent in the cities. You must remember that all business rests on that of the farmer. When he is prosperous the country is prosperous; when he is not prosperous, neither is any other line of business. I do not care what pursuit you take, whether it is the banker, the manufacturer, or business man of any line, his business must come back finally to the farmer. It is on the productions of the farms that all business rests.

Our nation's true glory, sir, has not in the past rested in its generals who have led our armies to victory on the field of battle, nor on its admirals who have commanded our ships on the high seas, but rather on the vast body of patriotic toiling American farmers who have gone out early and toiled until late, causing the earth to produce the raw materials which has made it possible for the machinery of our factories to turn out products for trade and traffic that have enriched our nation, causing our merchant marine to be seen in every port. [Applause.]

Our nation's welfare does not depend on the eloquence alone of its legislators in our halls of legislation; but rather on the toil and industry, the unfaltering patriotism, and the faithful pursuit of their duties of the farmers throughout the land. Our country's true citadels are not to be found in its fortresses, from which the gaping mouths of cannon may be seen, but rather in the vine-clad cottage on the hill, the home of the American farmer under the trees in the valley, surrounded by the fields made fertile by his industry.

These, sir, are the foundation and bulwark of our nation's prosperity and glory. There is more true music to our nation's glory in the sound of the plow as it goes through the furrow, in the sound of the sickle as it cuts down the grain, in the sound of the reaper as it gathers home the harvest—there is more true music, I say, to our nation's glory in all this than there is in the sound of the building of war ships or the beating of iron into cannon. Build more battle ships if you must! Buy more cannon if you will! But let us at least encourage the idea of using our iron for pruning shears!

Let us not, then, take from him, but rather let us give more to encourage the man with the hoe, the sickle, and the scythe. Let us do all we can to foster this industry. Let us not take from, but let us add to.

Why, sir, as a great orator has said, you might burn down your cities; but leave the farms and the cities will spring up again as if by magic; but destroy the farms and the grass will grow in the streets of every city in this land. [Applause.] We have had a recent illustration of that. A short time ago San Francisco stood out in all of its splendor a proud and happy city. In a day's time it was reduced to a heap of ashes. But from out those ashes will spring up a city that will be more glorious, a prouder city than the San Francisco of the past. There will spring up in an incredibly short time a city that will be a fair mistress of the seas, a splendid guardian of our golden western gate. And how will that be possible? Why, Mr. Chairman, because back of that city, surrounding that ash heap, are the great fertile valleys of the Sacramento and the San Joaquin, where thousands of American farmers by their industry are making the earth to produce its plenty. Because these farms exist, San Francisco must and will be rebuilt; but if those farms did not exist, its ash heap would remain there forever. If you could have reversed that scene, if you could have left the city stand in all of its splendor, but by the same bolt that destroyed the city have reduced those farms to ruin, I tell you that it would not be long before dust and rust would be the prevailing features of the city.

And so I might say of all the industries in America, for all depend on the farming industry. Let us, then, do all we can to encourage the calling.

We have discovered that the seed dealers of the land have combined in an effort to prevent the further distribution of these seeds. They have discovered that the free seed distribution was the only seed rate regulator, and they wish to rid themselves of all restraint. We have heard letters read from different parties against this distribution of seed; but I apprehend that many of them were obtained by these seed dealers. I venture the assertion that if anyone interested on the other side should call for letters favoring the distribution of seed you would have a thousand in favor of the distribution of seed to one against the distribution.

If the distribution of seed accomplished but the one object of binding the farmers closer to the National Government at Washington it would be well worth the sending of them out. There can be no question but every package of seed that goes out from the Government at Washington to a certain extent binds the man who receives it closer to his Government. It is all right for business men to pooh-pooh this idea; it is well enough for you to talk about your "kid-glove farmers," men of large affairs who have mixed with the world, but I will tell you it is a different question with the isolated farmer, the farmer living on the plains where he has little opportunity of mixing with the world, where the postman comes but seldom. When such a farmer receives one or several of these packages of seed he can not but welcome them with pleasure. It will at once occur to him that his Government at Washington has remembered him, and it can not but bind him closer to his Government.

Some simple-minded people are inclined to look down upon the calling of the farmer, and some farmers may feel that their calling is not looked up to with the highest of respect, but when he gets these seeds from Washington he realizes that the Government is a sort of partner with him, that the Government recognizes his calling as the highest of all, and he can not help but be encouraged.

It has been suggested on this floor that we should send out sample suits of clothes or sample articles of merchandise. Those questions, while propounded in good faith, are ridiculous. This Government does not recognize the selling of clothes or any other one line of business as a national affair, but it does recognize that agriculture is the great business of the nation; that it is from agriculture we have obtained our national prosperity; that this nation is predominantly an agricultural nation. Agriculture is recognized as the great national calling, and by sending out these seeds the nation very properly places its stamp of approval on this one business. There is no analogy whatever between the sending out of sample suits of clothes and the sending out of free seed.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the sending out of these seeds suggests and encourages the idea of planting. We should inculcate upon the minds of every growing boy and girl the necessity of planting trees and all kinds of fruits and vegetables, and to-day I am glad to see in many of our schools tree planting has become a part of the instruction to the scholars. Now, the sending out of these seeds not only encourages but suggests the idea. There is little doubt in my mind that when the people throughout the Union receive these seeds the idea of planting is suggested to them. It must be true that a great deal more planting is done throughout the Union on this account, for when a package of seed is received it is in nearly every instance planted, not alone, but with other packages purchased. Small plats of ground that would otherwise be vacant are made to blossom on account of the seed. The seeds arrive and the people are reminded that it is planting time, and thus a great industry is fostered.

They tell us that this is a graft. The idea is too ridiculous to need refutation. There can be no graft where all the people receive the benefit. These seed go to all the people. It is the people's money redistributed to the people. I was particularly impressed with the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky yesterday, who suggested that if this really were a graft, if it were some special individual or some special industry or some favored corporation that was receiving an immense graft, those gentlemen who now oppose the distribution of these free seed would remain quietly in their seats. They would not oppose a real graft. If the steel combination or some other combination was making another gigantic steal, there would be no one—on the other side of the Chamber, at least—to oppose it; but since this is no graft, since it is a giving to the people—the common people, the great mass of the people—a very little of their own; since it does not accrue to the benefit of some specially favored interest, then, of course, they are loud to protest, as they always have been, against any measure that was for the benefit of the people, for the benefit of the masses, instead of for the benefit of some favored class. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for three minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Now, gentlemen, if we can inculcate the idea with every growing boy and girl of tree planting and plant planting, that would be a great national blessing. Boys and girls throughout the land look forward to the time they will receive these seed, and they plant them eagerly. It creates an interest in planting that could probably not be obtained so well in any other way.

There are a great many other and better arguments that might be made in favor of the continuance of the distribution of seeds, but these arguments, or many of them, have already been made by others on the floor of this House, and I shall not take up your time by repeating them.

The purpose of the great seed dealers in fighting this appropriation is plain. They recognize that the sending out of these Government seed is a great seed regulator, and they wish to be rid of all regulations tending to the benefit of the people.

I say, gentlemen, that we should continue this appropriation. I believe in some of the remarks of the gentleman who spoke last, who favored the distribution of peculiar seed as appropriate. But I say, Put back the usual appropriation, and instruct the Department to get a different kind of seed and a better kind than it has had in the past.

Though I come from a district lying entirely within the city of St. Louis, I am glad to take this opportunity to raise my voice in favor of this measure, which I believe to be of great benefit to the American farmers. I am glad to say a word in their behalf. I appeal to you, in the name of the farmers of America, that you do not this great wrong, but that you appropriate this money for the further continuation of this measure which in the past has resulted in the accomplishment of so much good. [Loud applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss the over-discussed proposition of free seeds; not because I do not regard the distribution of first-class garden and flower seed as valuable to the farmers of the country, but because I know that the proposition of distributing seed among the farmers will have sufficient champions upon the floor of the House.

I want to call attention to that item in this bill which makes provision for experiments in medicinal and poisonous plants.

We import into the United States each year drugs estimated in value $16,000,000. We buy from foreign countries drugs to the amount of $16,000,000 per annum. Dr. Rodney H. True, the chief in charge of this work, estimates that we can produce in the Southern States, on our own soil and with our peculiar climate, drugs which would amount in value to something over four or five million dollars per annum. We have at Florence, S. C., in the district of my colleague [Mr. ELLERBE] a drug farm operated by the Department of Agriculture. We are growing various drug plants there which are now imported into this country. We are growing belladonna, capsicum, and various other kinds of drug-producing plants, and we are growing them so successfully, from a financial point of view, that the expert in charge gives it to me as his opinion that that farm will net at least $75 per acre. Professor Galloway, who appeared before our committee, estimates that certain lands in the South, planted in these drug plants, will bring back to the cultivator a value of $40 or $50 per acre. The Department estimated for an increase of $8,000 for this work, not this particular work in South Carolina, but for the work scattered all over the United States. The committee allowed an increase of $4,000, but in making up the bill, by error that amount was left out, so that the bill as it now stands carries only what it carried last year for this particular purpose. I want to call the attention of the House to that fact, so that when the time comes for us to make the increase the Members will understand and know what we were doing. I want to insert in the RECORD a letter just received by me from Mr. J. W. McCowan, clerk of the court of Florence County, who has personal knowledge of this drug farm in South Carolina and of its success. It makes interesting reading.

In that connection I want also to insert a letter from Dr. Rodney H. True, the physiologist in charge of this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to insert certain letters in the RECORD in connection with his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters are as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
BUREAU OF PLANT INDUSTRY,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1906.

Hon. A. F. LEVER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 25, requesting information concerning the future plans for drug work in South Carolina, and I beg to outline the plans in so far as they have shaped themselves, presuming, of course, on the means wherewith to carry them out.

An increased sum for the work of drug-plant investigations was asked in order to enable us to respond to certain demands for new work which have been very pressing and represent an undoubted necessity. Our plans also include the continuation of the old work, with such extensions as might be permitted. As to South Carolina the plans for the future years include the following main items:

A continuation of our work at Ebenezer on an area of 15 acres, in cooperation with Mr. E. Cottingham. On this area we plan to put out material for experimental purposes primarily, on which we can not only study the adaptation of climate and soils, but also methods of curing, selection, etc. On this area the primary object is to get information along scientific lines as well as along economic lines.

In response to the urgent request of the Board of Trade at Florence we have contemplated taking charge of another area of 15 acres, furnishing merely the seed and supervision, the Board of Trade or the gentleman on whose place the experiment is to be placed meeting all of the expenses. On this area we plan to put such crops as seem to promise good financial return without any special effort to get anything other than a purely economic test—that is, without special reference to the scientific aspect of the problem.

The increase contemplated would not carry more work in South Carolina than that here outlined, and if further work were to be done it would need to be met by additional funds.

Very respectfully,
R. H. TRUE,
Physiologist in Charge.

Approved:
B. T. GALLOWAY, Chief of Bureau.

FLORENCE, S. C., April 20, 1906.

Mr. A. F. LEVER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In view of the success that has already been achieved toward the drug-plant experimental work that the Department of Agriculture has been conducting in this county, and in behalf of its future welfare, I take the liberty, as a citizen of the county, to write you and ask you to do all you can in your capacity to help the work. We are well aware that you have always been ready to help South Carolina enterprises, and that you have been very successful in that direction.

I now write not only to enlist your sympathies, which doubtless we now have, but to ask your heartiest cooperation toward the support of this work. We believe that great possibilities are embraced in this problem and the meager fund now available for the work is not sufficient to develop the industry.

We know that it is in the power of Congress alone to give this help, and we look to you as our able Representative for help, knowing that your position in Congress puts you where you can be of aid to us.

Trusting that in the future we might see the fruits of your works,
I beg to remain, yours, very truly,
J. W. MCCOWN.

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I ask unanimous consent that I may be recognized for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to continue his remarks for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of an amendment to this bill appropriating a reasonable and adequate sum for the purchase of seeds and distribution of the same. In support of my personal conviction as to this item, I desire to be heard and place on record a few reasons why I am in favor of the same.

Much has been said, pro and con, during the past sessions of Congress why this item of appropriation should be included in the agricultural appropriation bill, or why it should be excluded from the same. It has been asserted with a great deal of confidence and candor and frankness that the distribution of seeds amongst the constitutents of a Member of Congress was not a very dignified function, and it was not the kind and character of work which should be imposed upon one holding so important and honorable a position as Representative in our Federal legislative body. In earlier years it was not contemplated to be a part of his duties. It must be conceded to some extent that the distribution of seeds is in the nature of graft, but the expenditure of money in other Departments and liberality in favor of many other classes of citizens may also be denominated a character of graft.

The original intention of an appropriation for the purchase of seed and distribution of the same was to disseminate rare seeds in various parts of the country, and exchange, plant, develop, and adapt the same to the diversified soils and climatic conditions of the United States.

Through succeeding years the character of this business enlarged and the demands for seed multiplied until its size, magnitude, and ramifications acquired the present proportions.

Notwithstanding the humiliating and sometimes undignified character of this function, I am still in favor of continuing the appropriation for the purchase of seeds and distribution of the same. In favoring this measure, or amendment, and continuing the past practices I am only expressing my individual sentiment as the same is emphasized and has been voiced by my constituency through past experience.

I represent a district in eastern Pennsylvania whose interests are, approximately, half farming and half city—industrial and manufacturing. It is a district which according to the last census had a population of 253,508, and presently approximates 300,000; a district which at the last Congressional election, in 1904, polled 51,294 votes for the several candidates for Congress. The usual allotment of seeds to a Member was inadequate to accommodate the large demand of my large and disproportionate constitutency, and by reason thereof the Secretary of Agriculture credited me with a double quota (24,000 packages in all), which have been distributed among the electors and families of my district; and still there is and was a clamor and demand for more, and I have frequently observed that those who were omitted in the distribution made complaint and inquired why they have been overlooked in the distribution of this Government favor, gift, or graft, or whatever you may term it.

Besides the voluntary dissemination of seed through my clerks, amongst my constituency I am in receipt of thousands of postal cards and letters, in every conceivable form and language spoken by my constituency, begging for garden and flower seeds. This extraordinary and popular demand for this governmental favor convinces me that I would be violating my obligations and the demand of my constituency if I should refuse to support this amendment to the agricultural appropriation bill for the purchase and delivery of seeds. I am in receipt of a communication of but a single constituent, out of a total of 300,000, opposing the continuance of free distribution of seeds.

Our farmers and agricultural interests represent the solidity and foundations of the strength, progression, and permanence of our Republic and its institutions. I can not observe any humiliation or undignified conduct in the distribution of this Government patronage. Every rural Member, in his contest for nomination or election, has solicited the true, honest, clean, and nonpurchasable farmer vote, and the victory and success of many Members has depended entirely on this class of our citizenship.

Congress has granted to every Member an allowance for clerk hire. The average clerk has little to do after adjournment, during the summer and fall season. He can with ease and without great loss of time during that period procure the names of those who desire this favor, address the franked slips, and forward them to the Department, whereupon in due time they are forwarded to the persons to whom the franks are addressed. And all this is and can be done without inconvenience, care, attention, or loss of dignity or caste of the Congressman.

If this favor can be called a "graft," then, indeed, it is a small one, and it is the only graft that the farmer receives out of our governmental patronage. It has been said that it is a useless expenditure. If the farmer desires the same, I say and shall insist that we give it to him. The only thing the agriculturist receives for his numerous contributions is good government, the protection of his home and the country in which he lives, which we all so much love.

We had much better cut down the appropriations and the expenditures in other Departments, where we spend hundreds of millions of dollars, than to cut off this patronage or appropriation, which is not equivalent to one thousandth part of our total expenditures.

We have passed a pension appropriation bill carrying almost $140,000,000. We have enacted into law an Army appropriation bill carrying more than $80,000,000. We annually appropriate for the maintenance of our Navy more than $100,000,000. The expenses of our post-office facilities and Post-Office Department aggregate $190,000,000. To maintain our legislative, executive, and judiciary departments there must be appropriated annually approximately $30,000,000; our consular service, our fortifications, and the management of the business of our Government annually cost us additionally $100,000,000 and upward.

May I ask, Who assists and pays a large portion of these enormous expenditures? The answer inevitably must be that the farmer, the agriculturist, and the small holder of real estate contribute their fair proportion. And yet there are some on the floor of this House who, with eloquence and emphasis, would deny this small favor or gift to that class of people who in the past have been enjoying and receiving the same.

Thus wrote my stenographer from my home city during the distribution period about a year ago. She said:

Did you ever read Oliver Twist, by Charles Dickens; and if you have, do you remember the famous author's chapter, how the thieves came to see Nancy Sikes? Well, that's me. They have all been here, and they all came for seed. Some were long and some were short; some were fat and some were lean; some had one eye and some had two; but they all came to see Nancy. They have come from the slate and cement regions, from the cities, boroughs, the country districts, and all sections. All classes have come, including the Slavs and Huns, with buckets, baskets, and bags for the seed that Uncle Sam so generously, properly, and considerately deals out to his people. I am kept busy from morning till night giving out seed.

The farmer is subjected to onerous burdens of life in trade and in business. By reason of the inequalities of our tariff schedules he pays proportionately more to the maintenance of the Government than any other class of citizens. Nearly everything that he requires to support and maintain his family, and that he uses to till and cultivate the soil and prepare his commodities for market, are subject to high and unjust tariff duties. The Paris green which he must use to exterminate the potato bug is taxed 15 per cent ad valorem; the paints which he uses to beautify his home and farm buildings are subject to a tariff of $5.25 per ton; he must pay for his table knives, his forks, steels, and other kinds of knives a duty of no less rate than 45 per cent ad valorem; the nails and spikes, iron and steel, which he requires to make and repair his fences, are taxed six-tenths of 1 per cent per pound; the sugar which he daily consumes in his household is subject to a tax of 0.95 cent per pound on No. 16 Dutch Standard, testing not above 75 degrees, and on every additional degree said article is taxed thirty-five one-thousandths of 1 per cent per pound; the cotton and woolen goods which he and his family wear to protect them from the inclemencies of heat and cold, are heavily taxed; his agricultural implements, manufactured out of iron and steel, are so highly taxed that the farmer and dealers in Europe, South America, and Canada can purchase them cheaper than the American farmer. Yea, nearly everything that he must use and wear contributes, and in many instances unjustly and inequitably, to the support and maintenance of the Government. And yet it is contemplated to deny to the American farmer the use of a few packages of seed, which he has in times past used, enjoyed, and appreciated.

I hope that every Member representing a rural district will remember the farmer vote which he received in his political contest. I believe in reciprocity, and I believe it to be the duty of every Member representing a rural district to support an amendment, such as I suggested during the beginning of my remarks. At least, I shall not have it said that by my vote and action the farmer will be denied the use and reception of this favor or patronage, which is contemplated by an amendment to be proposed to the agricultural appropriation bill now under consideration. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For actual and necessary traveling expenses; for telegraph and telephone service; for gas and electric current; for forage, ice, postage, and washing towels; for express and freight charges; for the purchase of chemicals, materials, office, field, and laboratory supplies, fertilizers, office fixtures, fuel, apparatus, machinery, tools, and other implements, and repairs to same, horses, vehicles, horseshoeing, and harness; for rent and repairs, not to exceed $19,000, in the District of Columbia; and for all other necessary expenses, $389,260.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds: For the purchase, propagation, testing, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants; for rent and repairs; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required, in the city of Washington and elsewhere; all necessary office fixtures and supplies, fuel, transportation, paper, twine, gum, printing, postal cards, gas, and electric current, traveling expenses, and all necessary material and repairs for putting up and distributing the same, and to be distributed in localities adapted to their culture, $242,920, of which amount not less than $202,000 shall be allotted for Congressional distribution. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend the said sum, as nearly as practicable, in the purchase, testing, and distribution of such valuable seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, the best he can obtain at a public or private sale, and such as shall be suitable for the respective localities to which the same are to be apportioned, and in which same are to be distributed as hereinafter stated, and such seeds so purchased shall include a variety of vegetable and flower seeds suitable for planting and culture in the various sections of the United States. An equal proportion of five-sixths of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents, or mailed by the Department upon the receipt of their addressed franks; and the person receiving such seeds shall be requested to inform the Department of the results of the experiments therewith: Provided, That all seeds, bulbs, plants, and cuttings herein allotted to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution remaining uncalled for on the 1st of April shall be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture, giving preference to those persons whose names and addresses have been furnished by Senators and Representatives in Congress, and who have not before, during the same season, been supplied by the Department: And provided also, That the Secretary shall report, as provided in this act, the place, quantity, and price of seeds purchased, and the date of purchase; but nothing in this paragraph shall be construed to prevent the Secretary of Agriculture from sending seeds to those who apply for the same. And the amount herein appropriated shall not be diverted or used for any other purpose but for the purchase, testing, propagating, and distribution of valuable seeds, bulbs, mulberry and other rare and valuable trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants: Provided, however, That upon each envelope or wrapper containing packages of seeds the contents thereof shall be plainly indicated, and the Secretary shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be, and the best adapted to the locality he represents: Provided, also, That the seeds allotted to Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-fourth parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery not later than the 10th day of January: Provided further, That $37,780 of which sum, or so much thereof as the Secretary of Agriculture shall direct, may be used to collect, purchase, test, propagate, and distribute rare and valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experiments with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country; and the seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants thus collected, purchased, tested, and propagated shall not be included in general distribution, but shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment stations: And provided also, That $3,000 of the sum thus appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may be used for the erection of necessary buildings. Total for free-seed distribution, $242,920. Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $792,340.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order on that amendment. I would like to agree with the gentleman from Virginia as to the limit of debate on the amendment.

Mr. LAMB. What time does the gentleman from New York propose?

Mr. WADSWORTH. How much does the gentleman need on that side?

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, let us have the point of order debated now and decided.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does not the gentleman want to debate the merits of the amendment?

Mr. HAY. I understand the gentleman from New York has reserved the point of order with a view to have debate on the merits of the amendment. I think we ought to have the debate on the point of order first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia demands that the point of order be debated first.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Well, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no warrant of law for it.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire whether this amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is an amendment to the paragraph or a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. It is an amendment to the paragraph just read.

Mr. POLLARD. I have an amendment to the amendment, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer that at the proper time.

Mr. HAY. I understood the Chair to say that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia was an amendment to the paragraph just read. I did not understand that the gentleman from Virginia offered it as an amendment, but as a new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia offer this as an amendment to the paragraph just read or as a new paragraph?

Mr. LAMB. As a new paragraph. The Chair will bear in mind that it embraces the next paragraph in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That being the case, before taking up the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, it will be in order to perfect the paragraph that has just been read, and if there are any amendments they should be offered now.

Mr. KEIFER. And the point of order pending against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment to the paragraph which has just been read, which the Clerk will report, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia will be considered as an amendment pending, as a new paragraph.

Mr. KEIFER. And subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia must be an amendment to the paragraph that has just been read, because it changes the total amount; it changes the figures in the final paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 18 and 19, page 21, by making them read "four hundred and thirty-nine thousand two hundred and sixty dollars."

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, I desired during the general debate on this bill to use thirty minutes of time for the consideration of the bill, but there were three or four members of the committee who desired to discuss the bill who gave way last Saturday to allow the prolonged political discussion that took place. Inasmuch as this is a very important matter which I wish to present, and in view of the fact that I was denied my time under general debate, I should like to ask unanimous consent to proceed for twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for twenty minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have heard a prolonged debate here as to the merits and demerits of free Congressional garden seeds. We have heard very little discussion of the one question that goes to the meat of the cocoanut. Gentlemen seem to have the idea that there is a great deal of merit wrapped up in this item of the distribution of garden seeds. I take the position, Mr. Chairman, that there is absolutely no good that comes from the item known as the "distribution of garden seeds," where it relates wholly to common varieties, such as are usually sent out under the Congressional frank.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment seeks to increase the appropriation for carrying on the work of introducing new varieties, developing and perfecting new varieties, and the distribution of them throughout the country, and to carry to the people the information that has been accumulated by this Department.

Now, for the distribution of garden seeds there has been appropriated an amount of money as follows:

For the Congressional vegetable and flower seeds, for seeds and plants entering into regular quotas; cotton, tobacco, lawn grass, orange trees, not in regular quotas, and so on, making a total of $132,754.73. There has also been appropriated in addition to this, from the statutory roll of salaries, $19,320, and there has also been expended in the payment of freight or postage to the railway companies, in the distribution of these garden seeds, $34,500, making a total of $186,574.73 that has been expended for the distribution of common sorts of seeds.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to enter into a discussion of the merits of these seeds that are sent out. We will all concede that they are the very best that can possibly be secured. There is no question about that at all; but, granting that, the fact remains that there is absolutely no good derived from the distribution of these garden seeds outside of the advantages derived by those who are engaged in truck gardening. I will admit that people who are engaged in gardening in the suburbs of our great cities or on farms near the great cities might perhaps secure some good from the continuation of the distribution of these free garden seeds; but as far as the farmer is concerned, as far as the great mass of farmers of this country is concerned, it does them no good whatever. What good does it do the farmer to receive a little package worth perhaps 25 cents? To show the appreciation that the people in my district have of this matter, I want to read one or two letters that I have received. These letters came unsolicited on my part and are the honest expressions of the writers. Here is a letter from Weeping Water, my own county, Nebraska:

I have just received the garden seed, for all of which I wish to return thanks. Nevertheless I wish the distribution of ordinary garden seed might be discontinued, and believe it ought to be. So far as I can find out, very few, if any, of them are ever used, and when they are, frequently prove to be less desirable varieties than can be bought at home for a little, if any, more than the postage costs the United States.

Here is another letter from a farmer living near the city of Lincoln, Nebr., and he closes his letter by saying:

Cut out old, bum seeds. Anything new and scarce is what we want.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. POLLARD. I yield for a question.

Mr. CANDLER. Those two letters in which the gentlemen say they want the seed cut out are all right, but I would like to ask the gentleman how many letters he has received from people who desire to have the seed sent to them?

Mr. POLLARD. I want to say to the gentleman that I have sent out under my frank something like 13,000 packages of garden seed, and I have not received to exceed fifteen or eighteen letters in acknowledgment of the receipt of those seeds; and there has not been a single one who has asked me to continue it or who has thanked me for the seeds and who accompanied that statement by the information that the seeds were of any value or that they placed any appreciation upon them at all.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman evidently does not understand my question. I ask how many letters he has received making personal requests for garden seed?

Mr. POLLARD. I do not know. I received something like thirty or forty. I have not kept a record of them, but I do not believe the number would exceed that.

Mr. CANDLER. The gentleman has received a great many more of that kind of letters than of the kind that he has just read.

Mr. POLLARD. Yes; and I will say in connection with that, that it is customary all over the country for a great many people when they can get something for nothing to undertake to secure it. The part that the people like about this free garden seed is your recognition of them. Now, I have not a doubt but every person who received a package appreciated it from this point of view, that he was glad I did not overlook him, but he placed no importance whatever upon the real value of the seeds themselves.

I want to read now a portion of a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture bearing directly upon this point. In a letter dated March 15, written to Hon. J. A. TAWNEY, the Secretary uses this language:

> In my former letter I commented on the value of this miscellaneous distribution of garden seeds, calling attention to the fact that it was difficult to state what such value might be. I also emphasized the fact that in my judgment the money thus expended could be put to better use in line with a class of work described under group 2. As long as the Department is required to do the work, however, it has been our effort to secure the very best seeds available and to see that they were thoroughly tested and true to type in order that their distribution might in a gradual cumulative way encourage people throughout the country to demand the highest grades of seeds.

So it will be seen from the quotation from the Secretary of Agriculture that he is not anxious about the continuation of the distribution of the ordinary seeds, but is anxious about the continuation of the work in the propagation and introduction of new varieties of high value.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is there any reason why under this bill everything that the gentleman asks and all the appropriation he demands should not be put into the bill and at the same time the appropriation be kept up for the distribution of seeds?

Mr. POLLARD. I think there is, Mr. Chairman, and I will answer the gentleman by saying this, that the reason I think that is the case is because I believe that every Member on the floor of this House when he took his oath of office pledged himself to scrutinize every appropriation that came in here, whether it amounts to $5 or whether it amounts to $5,000,000, because the principle is the same, and that the expenditure of every dollar of the public money ought to be where it can be of some service and will bring value for value given. And I do not believe there is any good of any character whatever derived from the distribution of free garden seed.

Mr. POWERS. Do you not think those Members who believe that the expenditure of this money is a benefit to the farmers in their district are quite as conscientious in expending money for the public good as any others?

Mr. POLLARD. I certainly do.

Mr. POWERS. Then why refuse this appropriation rather than many others?

Mr. POLLARD. I do not question the motive of the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman on the floor of this House, and I do not care to be understood in that way at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. For a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not this the first time the gentleman has scrutinized an appropriation bill in this House?

Mr. POLLARD. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What other bills has the gentleman scrutinized?

Mr. POLLARD. All of them that came before the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Have you made speeches on them?

Mr. POLLARD. I have not.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; you made a speech on the deficiency appropriation bill, and a very good one, too.

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to devote any more of my time to the discussion of the question of garden seed, but I have another matter that I wish to present to the House that is of the utmost importance, and I wish o devote House that is of the utmost importance, and I wish to devote quite a little time to that. Now, my purpose in making my address to-day is this: I believe there are other fields of the Agricultural Department where we can do a great deal more good for the farmer. If that is the object of our appropriations, if that is the object of our solicitude, to carry the most good to the farmer, then I have another proposition which I submit, and I hope I can receive the careful attention of the committee. Mr. Chairman, we have in the great Mississippi and Missouri valleys of the West something like 92,000,000 apple trees. Last year there were produced on those 92,000,000 trees something like 62,000,000 bushels of apples, two-thirds of a bushel per tree. This very light yield of apples from these 92,000,000 apple trees was due to the fact that there is existing in the orchards of the great West parasites, insects, and various kinds of fungi that are utterly ruining our orchards. Under a properly cultivated and cared-for orchard those trees that only produce two-thirds of a bushel of apples ought to produce not less than 5 bushels of apples per tree, and that is a very low estimate, as anyone will concede who knows anything about the growing of fruit. Mr. Chairman, with that yield we would have, instead of 62,000,000 bushels of apples, 460,000,000 bushels, or a valuation of not less than $110,000,000. In addition to that, there is a direct loss to the fruit growers of this country who are engaged in the production of peaches, pears, plums, cherries, grapes, and other varieties of fruit of something like $40,000,000 more, making a total loss of $150,000,000 annually. Now, the trouble with this whole proposition is this, gentlemen: There is not a disease that attacks our fruit trees in this country that I know of; there is not a single disease where the remedy is not known; there is not a single one of the many diseases that are destroying the fruit interests of the West that the Agricultural Department here in Washington has not discovered a remedy that will destroy every one of those pests. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, here is a place where we can spend some money at a profit. Here is a place where we can do the farmer some real good. Here is the place where we can spend some money that will add some value to the wealth of the nation. Along this line I wish to spend the money I vote for as a Member in this august body. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the Bureau of Animal Industry, in our live-stock interests, the situation in a measure is the same. Diseases in our live-stock interests, such as blackleg, scab, that attacks our sheep and cattle; the foot-and-mouth disease, that has recently been suppressed in the New England States; the cattle tick or Texas fever, which has afflicted the cattle interest of the whole Southwest, and many other diseases I might mention, bring about an annual loss of something like $150,000,000. And in connection with this I wish to say the situation is very different from the fact that the United States Department of Agriculture has furnished the farmer the remedy. When a contagious disease breaks out, when the live-stock interest is attacked by some disease, an expert is sent out there. That contagious disease or territory in which this contagious disease is running rampant is placed under a most strict and stringent quarantine. The most strict quarantine laws are observed in order to wipe out such disease. That is right and proper, and I understand the Committee on Agriculture has taken care of this subject in an ample way, which I think is just.

But the situation is different when we come to our fruit interests. When a farmer sends in a report to the Agricultural Department at Washington that his apples are being destroyed, that his cherries are being destroyed, that his pear trees are being destroyed, by parasites and these other enemies that are affecting his crops, what do they do? Instead of sending experts out there to place a quarantine about the infected district, he is simply sent a farmers' bulletin, and that is the extent of the effort that is made by the Department to help him to control those diseases. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I wish to say that while I appreciate, I think, fully the importance and the value of the farmers' bulletins that are sent out, yet they do not offer a sufficient remedy. When I first came to Washington, in view of the fact that I have always lived on a farm, in view of the fact that that is my occupation now, the first thing that I did was to go to the Department of Agriculture, simply because I thought that that was the one Department in which I had the greatest interest, and the Department through which I could give my people the best service. And the first thing I did was to secure from the Secretary a list of the bulletins that they published. I went through that long list of bulletins, and I was only able to find five or six that I cared to send to the people of my district.

Now, why is that the case? The trouble with these farmers' bulletins lies in the fact that they are written by experts, by scientific men, and they shoot entirely over the heads of the people that are not familiar with scientific questions. The trouble lies in the fact that when a farmer gets one of these bulletins it is couched in technical terms, and after he has read it he knows very little about the practical way of reaching the remedy which is suggested in the bulletin. In addition to that, these bulletins are too verbose; they have too much in them. The scientist discusses too many matters that are entirely irrelevant and have no bearing whatever upon the question in which the farmer is directly interested. As a result his mind is diverted and his attention is attracted to other matters and he does not reach the real remedy that is offered.

And in addition to this, Mr. Chairman—and I consider this one of the greatest objections and greatest faults that I find in these farmers' bulletins—is the fact that we have a great country in these United States, and when one of these scientists comes to write a bulletin he tries to write one that will fit and apply to the whole United States. The bulletin is not prepared with reference to locality, and when a farmer in Nebraska is sent a bulletin it may treat on subjects that relate wholly to the New England States, and vice versa.

My colleague [Mr. HINSHAW] has just handed me a slip of paper which carries the information that the suggestion has gone out that I am a nurseryman. I do not know that that has any bearing on the question, but I simply want to say that I never sold five cents' worth of shrubs or trees of any character in my life, nor was I ever connected with any nursery of any character whatever. I do not know that it would be any offense if I had been, as far as that is concerned.

My attention has been diverted from the point I had in mind, but I wish to come back to it.

I think that the Committee on Agriculture ought to take up this subject of farmers' bulletins, and I think the whole system ought to be revised. When a bulletin is published, I do not care on what subject it treats, it ought to be prepared with reference to a locality, and when a Congressman from Mississippi or from Nebraska or from any other State sends to the Department for a bulletin he ought to be given a bulletin that relates wholly to the subject applying to his district or locality.

Mr. MURDOCK. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] has expired.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have time in which to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HINSHAW] asks that his colleague, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD], may have leave to complete his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman has read some of these farmers' bulletins himself?

Mr. POLLARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have read a good many of them very carefully, and a good many of them are on general subjects. I have found them all very interesting and all very simple, and I approve of them. Now, the gentleman said they should be written as regards locality. Will he give the subject-matter of some of the bulletins that ought to be written as regards locality—cotton, of course, as regards the South, and corn as regards the Mississippi Valley? Now, will the gentleman give us just one bulletin regarding one locality that is not written?

Mr. POLLARD. I shall be glad to do so. Take the one subject of fruit industry. It is a fact that no bulletin can be prepared with reference to the State of Kansas. Carry it down to the last analysis, affecting the question of apples, that will apply to your whole State. Now, then, when that fact exists in relation to a single State, why is it that the great Department of Agriculture goes on and prepares bulletins that should not take into account the different sections and localities of the country and have the bulletin prepared with reference to the peculiarities of that locality instead of making them all of a general character?

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Is it not a fact that the agricultural colleges of the different States are able to make up the bulletins necessary for that particular State and supplement the bulletins sent out by the Agricultural Department?

Mr. POLLARD. They do a splendid work along that line, and they do great good, and so far as they go their work is complete, but the trouble with the whole matter is this——

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Would it not be better to intrust the State agricultural colleges of the different States with those investigations that apply to the different States in which the colleges are situated, and provide them with the necessary means rather than intrust the whole matter to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. POLLARD. I will take that matter up when I reach it during the course of my remarks. I do not care to do so at this time.

I do not wish to take the position, nor do I wish to carry the impression that I am opposed to the publications of these farmer bulletins, because that is not the case. I think these bulletins do great good. I think they ought to be published, but I think this whole system ought to be revised, and that the bulletins ought to be remodeled. A great deal of the matter that is put in them ought to be eliminated, because it is not germane and is immaterial. It ought to be cut out and the bulletin ought to be made more plain, more explicit, and simple and clear of all scientific and technical verbiage that simply beclouds a man who is not familiar with scientific questions.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly.

Mr. LEVER. As I understand the gentleman from Nebraska, his idea is that the bulletins of the Department ought to have more peculiar reference to the individual communities and sections?

Mr. POLLARD. That is my idea.

Mr. LEVER. Let me ask the gentleman if he does not think it best to permit the State experiment stations through their bulletins to reach that problem?

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will say that which I have in mind is this: I received a bulletin from the Department of Agriculture which I think was one of the best bulletins I read among the whole lot which were sent to me for distribution. I did not send out this particular bulletin. The trouble with the bulletin was this: It went on to urge persons to plant orchards for home use. It presented the idea that every farmer in every part of the country should plant in his garden at least sufficient fruit trees to produce enough fruit for the use of his own family—and that is right; that is something we ought to encourage with every farmer from one extreme of the country to the other; he ought to have a garden patch in which he should have certain trees of all the particular kinds of fruit that will grow in that section of the country, so that the family could have fruit all the year. The trouble was that it recommended certain varieties of trees to be planted. If I had sent that bulletin out to the people of my district it would have told the farmers to plant certain varieties of trees that every farmer who knows anything about fruit trees in that country knows will not grow in our section of country, thereby absolutely nullifying all the good effects that might be derived from that particular bulletin. That is why I object to these bulletins, and that is the trouble about them. They put something into them that destroys the force and effect of all good that might be derived from the whole bulletin.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I must hasten on. The position I take is that I want these bulletins revised, simply eliminating abuses that have grown up and those features that tend to confuse the mind of the farmer.

The present purpose of my whole remarks, and the purpose of my amendment is this: I want, instead of sending out these farmers' bulletins, that is general, as an entire solution of this problem and as the summum bonum of all the work the Department does of this kind, I want to send the experts into the country from the Department of Plant Industry, just the same as they have in the Department of Animal Industry.

Through the experiment stations, I want experts sent out to teach the people how to apply the remedies that will control these evils. Down here in Virginia and West Virginia during the last year they have lost something like $10,000,000 as a direct result of the ravages of the bitter rot in the apples, and yet the Department here at Washington has positive information that will enable the people down there entirely to drive out that disease that is destroying the apple crop. The same thing is true in the great West. We have out there a disease known as the "apple scab," which is prevalent all over the country, but which has broken out in very virulent form all through the Mississippi Valley and is literally destroying our whole fruit interest. Now, I want the Department of Agriculture to take experts, and, through the Nebraska Experiment Station, through the Missouri Experiment Station, through the Iowa Experiment Station, and all these other experiment stations, by cooperation with them and with the fruit growers, introduce methods that will exterminte these evils and these diseases that are destroying our fruit interests. I think this work should be carried on all over the country. It has begun in a small way through the South. The Department of Agriculture has spent thousands of dollars in educating the people of the South how to combat the cotton boll weevil. It has cooperated in the way I have suggested should be done with our fruit interest, in introducing new varieties of cotton that will ripen before the boll weevil comes in and by improving the quality of the cotton along other lines has done a great work which I think is right. I have no objection to that money being spent in the South, but I want the same energy that has been put forth for the suppression of the cotton diseases in the South also to be expended throughout the North and the Northwest.

A great deal has been done in the way of farmers' institutes in carrying information to the farmers as to how to destroy these pests that are devastating our crops, and that also is a good work, but there is nothing that does the same amount of good or that will carry the same amount of weight or the same influence as an oral or ocular demonstration. Oral demonstrations should be conducted under the supervision of these Government experts in the different fruit sections and demonstrate to the people how to control these diseases. Experts should be sent direct into orchards here and there all over the fruit belt. The farmers in the surrounding neighborhood should be invited to witness the oral demonstration the expert makes. In this way the orchardist will be taught what remedies to use, and how and when to apply these remedies that will destroy these pests. That is what I am pleading for now. In my amendment I have asked that $50,000 be added to this item for the purpose of carrying to the people this great fund of information that has been gathered on this subject.

We have spent thousands upon thousands of dollars in accumulating this scientific information that is of inestimable value to the people. Now, gentlemen, those of us who are so anxious to do something for the farmer, to give him something of real value, let us insert this item in the appropriation bill and clothe the Agricultural Department with funds that will enable them to go out in the country and give the people the information that will make them able to control these pests that are simply exterminating the fruit interests all over the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am using altogether too much time, but there is another very important subject that I can not pass over without referring to it at least casually. That is the subject of the improvement of the standard of quality of our seeds. A great deal has been done in the last few years in the way of plant breeding, of improving the quality of our seeds. It has been the custom for years in the animal kingdom for men who are engaged in the production of certain strains of cattle and hogs and horses to breed to a type. Their animals are pedigreed and they keep on breeding year after year, gradually perfecting the breed and attaining the ideal standard. Now, it is found that in the plant kingdom men can breed with greater accuracy. They can produce the desired type to a greater degree of certainty, than in the animal kingdom. Great work has been done along that line.

Now, to call your attention to one great loss of the agriculturists of the country, I want to refer to our wheat interests. In 1903 we produced in this country 33,000,000 bushels less wheat than we produced in 1902. The average yield was 1½ bushels less per acre. In 1904 we produced 120,000,000 bushels less wheat than we did in 1902, a reduction in the average yield of 2 bushels per acre. We lost in those two years 150,000,000 bushels of wheat, and it was due entirely to the ravages of the rust in the wheat and to the Hessian fly. Now, here is a great field for the agriculturists to work in. Here is a great field of opportunity for the agricultural scientists to carry some information to the pepole that will be of real value.

The Department has discovered, as I understand, that it is impossible to introduce a cure or a remedy that will destroy the rust, so they have started out on another line. They have undertaken by breeding to produce a new variety of wheat that will be rust-resisting, and I understand the Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry says that they have already originated a species that is rust-resistant. We should encourage this work. If we can aid these experts to introduce a new variety of wheat that will be immune to rust it will be worth millions of dollars to the farmers of the country.

Now, here is another line on which I want some of this $50,000 which I have asked to be inserted in the bill to be spent. That is along the line of corn. There is an inviting field of experimental work and the Department is doing work along this line. I do not wish to carry the impression that they are not doing that, because they are, but I want the work to continue. I want the work pressed forward. I want more money spent along that line, because it is of the greatest possible consequence to the people all over the country.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL. It has been understood that the committee intended to offer an amendment similar to this, except that the amount would be $76,000 instead of $50,000. Why does not the gentleman, if he is in favor of these things which he has been talking about, increase his amendment to the amount which the committee are in favor of?

Mr. POLLARD. I am glad the gentleman has asked me the question. I will answer it in this way: The $76,000 that the committee proposes to insert in the bill simply gives the Department of Plant Industry an amount of money they had last year. I believe the chairman of the committee thinks that it carries something like $3,000 or $4,000 more than they used last year for that work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill carries $15,000 more than last year.

Mr. POLLARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it does not carry $15,000. If $15,000 were added to the bill, according to the gentleman's suggestion, it would not increase the appropriation for the other work by $15,000, but by $4,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, he has quoted me and I want the statement correct. I stated that the appropriation for the Bureau of Plant Industry is increased $15,460 over the appropriation allowed the Bureau of Plant Industry last year.

Mr. POLLARD. I thank the gentleman for his information. The gentleman from New York always tries to confuse the situation. I remember, when we had before us a discussion on the deficiency appropriation for the inspection of meat, the gentleman came in with the assertion that the Department had all the money it needed; all they had to do was to divert the appropriation along the line asked for. The trouble with the suggestion lies in the fact that if you do that they must and will be compelled to take it from some other work that is already being carried on, and that is the trouble with this suggestion. The $15,000 the committee has added to the bill has been asked for by the Chief of the Bureau for other work, and has nothing to do with the matter I am suggesting, and the gentleman knows very well that it does not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman will pardon me, I did not refer to the work he is in favor of. I said that the amount appropriated for the Bureau of Plant Industry had been increased $15,460 over the amount carried by the bill for the Bureau of Plant Industry last year. I am not referring to the work that the gentleman from Nebraska wants done; I am not referring to any particular work that the Bureau wants to do. I am simply referring to the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. POLLARD. I did not mean to misquote the gentleman.

Mr. MARSHALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. POLLARD. Certainly.

Mr. MARSHALL. I still do not understand that the gentleman has answered my question. I would like to know whether he is willing to increase this amount to $76,000. I am for his amendment, but I am preferably for the amount that the committee wants inserted.

Mr. POLLARD. I was interrupted before I had finished my answer. I am glad the gentleman has called my attention to it. The $76,000 that the committee seeks to add to this item in the bill will give, I think, only $4,000 more than the bill now carries. I will qualify that statement in this way: The $76,000 proposed simply seeks to cover the work that has been done heretofore in introducing new and choice varieties of seed and the cooperation work that is being done all over the country through the agricultural experimental stations. That is what the $76,000 seeks to cover. The bill as it now stands does not do that; it covers $37,740, which is to cover the work that has been done heretofore in accumulating choice seeds bought in foreign countries and bringing them into this country to introduce them—fruits, and things of that kind. Now, then, this $76,000 seeks to continue that work and help to introduce new varieties that are propagated in this country by breeding or otherwise. It simply gives the Bureau of Plant Industry the same amount of money, plus $4,000, that they had last year.

That is what the $76,000 seeks to cover, and if $76,000 is added to the bill, it will then give the Agricultural Department $4,000 more than they had last year for that particular work. Mr. Chairman, I want added, in addition to that, $50,000 to extend the work that I have been advocating on the floor. That $4,000 is not sufficient if this work is to be carried on as it should be all over the country. The Department has been accumulating this information, and what the committee wants is that they should continue that. I want them to do more than that. I want they should continue the improvement of this and then carry the information to the people, so that they will have the benefit of it. That is all there is to this whole proposition, and that is all there is to my amendment. If the committee comes in and seeks to increase the amount $76,000, I want the $50,000 also to be added in order that this work may be taken care of.

The Department, through its experiments, has demonstrated that under proper selection and cultivation not only the yield of corn can be increased but that the protein content can also be increased. Corn is the great staple crop of the West. This is the cereal that puts the fat on our swine and cattle. Scientific men tell us that corn, as a feed, is too rich in fat-producing ingredients and deficient in protein matter. In order for corn, with clover or timothy hay, to make completely balanced ration the protein content of corn should be increased. Under experiments already undertaken it has been demonstrated that this can be done by proper breeding and selection.

For the last six years there has been an annual yield of $2,261,000,000 in round numbers. If this work is encouraged by enlarging the appropriation for this item it seems to me that it is fair to assume that the annual yield can be increased not less than 10 per cent. This would increase the annual production of corn by at least $22,500,000. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of substituting for the free garden seed expenditures appropriations for carrying on oral demonstrations with the farmers from all over the country through the State experiments that will give the people information that will enable them to destroy the pests that are ruining our fruit interests. I am also in favor of spending some money for the development of a variety of wheat that will be rust resistant and for a variety of corn that will give a larger yield and a greater protein content. I am in favor of spending money along lines that will result in adding millions of dollars annually to the wealth of the farmers of this country. I think it is more important to give the farmer a variety of corn that will give an increased yield of 10 or 15 bushels per acre than it is to send him a package of garden seed that is perhaps worth 10 cents.

In conclusion, I wish to say this: We have been expending money ever since the foundation of the Government in different ways for the benefit of the people. We have been expending money for the improvement of our harbors and our rivers. We have been expending money for constructing levees along our rivers. We have been expending money for the expansion of the rural free delivery throughout the country, and we have been expending money for the erection of public buildings for the accommodation of the people. That work is all good. I have no objection to it, but the idea goes out or is suggested that this is a matter that should be left to the States, that Congress ought not to take it up. If that is the case, why is it that the people living along the river that should be dredged and deepened for the use of commerce should not bear that expenditure? Why should not the people pay in the different localities in the different communities for the extension of the free rural service? Why should not the people in the cities pay for the erection of their own public buildings, if that should be done? No one pretends that the people in the local communities should bear this expense. It is right that the Government should pay for it. My proposition is simply in line with work that has been carried on ever since the beginning of the Government. I believe it is right and proper that Congress should help to build up this great industry and help to extend the scope of it, and that is why I am advocating this amendment to-day, and I hope the committee will see to it that when this paragraph is passed it will carry not only the $76,000 the committee seeks to add to it, but also the $50,000 that I am presenting. [Great applause.]

I want to explain this matter before I leave the floor. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] be adopted, it will simply give to the Agricultural Department the same amount of money and no more than they had last year. It will not extend to this Bureau anything excepting this $15,400 which the chairman says they have added to the bill, but that is put in for some other work. I want this $50,000 added here and then when we take up the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] and that is adopted, that only will carry what the Department has had heretofore plus the $15,000 which the chairman of the committee says they have given, and I want my $50,000 added on to that. For that reason, I hope the $50,000 will be added, and then when we take up the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] we can add on the $76,000 which the chairman of the committee says they propose to insert in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it was my intention, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will suspend for a moment, the Chair will state that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] wanted to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I shall withhold my amendment for the present, until the chairman of the committee makes his statement.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I was directed by the Committee on Agriculture to ask that the appropriation be increased $76,000 for the Bureau of Plant Industry, and at the proper time I propose to offer such an amendment. If that is done the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] increasing the amount by $50,000 is not necessary. The Department asks only $76,000, and they will be perfectly satisfied and will be able to do the work that the gentleman from Nebraska wants and all other legitimate work during the fiscal year. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman will be voted down.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What is this $76,000 for?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is "For the collection, purchase, testing, propagating, and distribution of rare and uncommon seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, etc." I quote the language of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I understand what the bill says, and I understand also that that has not been the practice of the Department. What I want to get at is the fact. Does the gentleman propose to offer an amendment which will permit the Bureau of Plant Industry to use directly the sum of money which heretofore it has used out of the so-called Congressional seed fund?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. For the distribution of valuable plants.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is it.

Mr. MANN. So that that omission is to be corrected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. All the work of the Bureau of Plant Industry has been consolidated and covered, I might say, in one paragraph. Formerly there was a division of pathology, a division of botany, a division of agrostology, a division for tea investigation and sugar investigation, and others, and Mr. Galloway, the head of the Bureau, consolidated all these investigations in one paragraph, which expedites and facilitates the auditing of the accounts in the Treasury Department and results in less work. On page 18——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In just a moment. On page 18, in line 11, "to study plant and orchard diseases and demonstrate the treatment of the same." That covers the work the gentleman from Nebraska wants.

Mr. POLLARD. That authorizes the work, but it does not give the money to carry it out.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the committee, if this amendment is adopted does the proposition make appropriation for common seeds or does it affect the proposition of $37,000 to be given the experimental stations?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it does not; that is the next paragraph of the bill, at the bottom of page 21.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I ask you to close up this paragraph you are on before taking up the next one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are not taking up the next one. The motion before the House is that of the gentleman from Nebraska to increase this appropriation $50,000.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. As I understand it, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] is pending as an independent and separate paragraph. Now, to what part of the bill is this amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD]—is it after the word "dollars," in line 19 of page 21?

The CHAIRMAN. It is pending to the last paragraph read.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I ask that it be again read for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless objection is heard, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask this question of the gentleman from New York: If this committee should put back into the bill the $240,000 for Congressional seed distribution, and then add the $76,000 you have suggested in your coming amendment, will it be an addition of $76,000 to what the former bill carried?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It will.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia prevails, adding to the bill $240,000, which he says it carried, whether then the gentleman from New York will seek to add on the $76,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I answered that question to your colleague. I stated it would increase it $76,000.

Mr. POLLARD. In addition to $240,000?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I answered that question to your colleague.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I am afraid gentlemen do not understand the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska. It certainly should not prevail in the interest of the larger work of the Department, because it is not adequate. It only adds $50,000. Now, the committee amendment proposes to add to the same item $76,000. Therefore if we vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska you vote to restrict rather than enlarge the very work that you seem to take so much interest in and in which the committee has just as much and just as genuine an interest.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If the committee wants to increase this paragraph by $76,000, why does it not introduce an amendment?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Because we have not got to it, and the amendment is in the hands of the chairman to introduce just as quick as we get to it at the proper time.

Mr. POLLARD. Well, we are at the place now. Now, I would like to have this situation thoroughly understood. I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter. What I want to do is to increase the appropriation for this Department by $50,000 in excess of what they had last year. Now, then, if the chairman of this committee——

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. To clear this situation up—and I think possibly the gentleman himself is somewhat confused as to the actual meaning of this bill—now, when we cut out the Congressional seed distribution business and cut everything out, we did not make any provision for the growing of varieties of grain and plants here or for the purchase of rare and valuable seed. But the committee agreed among themselves to restore that portion of the original law which had been cut out, and we have not reached it.

Mr. POLLARD. This is the paragraph right here.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. And the gentleman from Nebraska proposes to add to this total, so that it shall be four hundred and thirty some odd thousand dollars, while the committee amendment proposes to increase it to $465,000.

Mr. POLLARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the committee is simply undertaking to befog this situation. What I wanted to do, as I said, is to increase it $50,000 over what they had last year. Now, if the committee is sincere in their position, why do they not undertake to increase my amendment by the $76,000? Why do they not do that?

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. We are perfectly willing.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POLLARD. I will yield to a question.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Does the gentleman question the good faith of the committee and its purpose to introduce this amendment for $76,000?

Mr. POLLARD. I do not. Not at all. But, Mr. Chairman, I want my amendment adopted, and then if the committee are sincere and want to bring in their amendment, they can do so. My amendment is directly before the House. Let us adopt that. That is to increase this appropriation by $50,000, and then if the chairman of the committee wants to bring in his amendment he may do so. But let us put on this $50,000 first.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, let me say just one word.

Mr. MANN. Is there any way we can get information?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, the gentleman from Nebraska consumed the definite time that was given to him and surrendered the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman took it again for five minutes. His time has expired and he has resumed his seat.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, during the time I have served in this House I believe I have never made any objection to any extension of time, but if we are ever to get through with this bill I think I must make objections to any extensions in the future.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] as to where he proposes to insert the additional $76,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was going to insert it on page 22. The total for the Bureau of Plant Industry, $587,200, with that increase of $76,000 would be $663,200, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia prevails that will be so much more, and the total will have to be corrected. I was going to correct the total all at once.

Mr. MANN. If the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia prevails that takes care of the question. But suppose it does not prevail?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It only partly takes care of the question.

Mr. MANN. You say you increase the bulk sum of the appropriation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That would not do any good. You have got to increase the authority to spend somewhere.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no. They have all the authority they want.

Mr. MANN. I see no authority in here authorizing the Department of Agriculture to do what they have been doing for years—as, for one instance, sending out seed that is inoculated with bacteria.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On the bottom of page 18, line 20, it reads:

To investigate the practical application in agriculture of the fixation of atmospheric nitrogen by bacteria and other micro-organism in soils and in the root tubercles of leguminous and other plants.

Mr. MANN. Will that authorize——

Mr. WADSWORTH. That authorizes just what the gentleman requests.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, that distribution has been made from the fund provided in the so-called "Congressional seed distribution?"

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is from the Bureau of Plant Industry fund.

Mr. MANN. And a portion of that money, I understand, has been used in the distribution of these seeds which are sent out through the country at the request of Members of Congress or otherwise, not included in the ordinary quota of distribution?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A portion of it has been used for this purpose—"to collect, purchase, propagate, test, and experiment with rare new seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants."

Mr. MANN. That paragraph of the bill only relates to the seed imported from foreign countries?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know what I am talking about. If the gentleman will look at the bottom of page 21 he will see the paragraph he refers to. It reads:

For the collection, purchase, testing, propagating, and distribution of rare and uncommon seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions, etc.

Mr. MANN. I thought the gentleman was referring to that paragraph.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. I was referring to line 7 on page 20.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I can simplify this whole thing. I move, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, the committee's amendment, that the amount be increased by $76,000. I move that as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and do so for the purpose of getting some information and give what I believe is the situation. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph on page 21, beginning with line 9 and ending with line 19 with the word "dollars," is the last paragraph that has been read in this bill. That paragraph does not in any way contain reference to any of the matters under discussion. At the expiration of the reading of that paragraph ending on line 19, the gentleman from Virginia offered an amendment which was, in substance and in fact, the old law which carried with it the Congressional seed appropriation. In my judgment, the time for the introduction of that amendment, or substitute, as it is, should have been postponed until the conclusion of the reading of the next paragraph. The gentleman from Virginia said that his substitute, or his amendment, took the place of the succeeding paragraph.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia is not before the House at all at the present time.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is what I am coming to.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not before the House, and it is an additional paragraph.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. But, Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the reading of the substitute, or amendment, of the gentleman from Virginia the gentleman from Nebraska moved to amend the gentleman's motion, as I understand it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; increase the sum, $389,260, by $50,000. That is the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska—to increase that sum $50,000. I ask him if that is the case?

Mr. POLLARD. It is.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture proposes, when we reach the next paragraph, to increase it $76,000, accomplishing the same purpose as the gentleman from Nebraska. There has been considerable discussion upon that. I do not think the House understands it. Now, in my judgment, the adoption of either one of these proposed amendments would tend to defeat the Congressional seed distribution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That does not defeat free seed distribution.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. In my judgment that will be the effect of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Certainly; therefore to clarify this situation, it seems to me we ought not to increase any of these totals until the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is voted on, to ascertain whether Congress desires to continue the Congressional appropriation for the distribution of seeds. The law refers to "new and valuable seeds." And in my judgment the motion of the gentleman from Virginia seeks to introduce into the Western States and all States certain new and valuable seeds, as the statute contemplates. There is no law authorizing the purchase of rare and uncommon seeds upon the statute books at the present time. The next item, if allowed to stand here as the committee left it, would be subject to the point of order. I shall disagree with the gentleman from Nebraska in what he says as to the value of the seeds. Certainly those that are included in the Congressional distribution are new and valuable, but I do not care to take up that, because that question will come up as soon as the motion of the gentleman from Virginia is reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that his time may be extended for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, it seems to me, to simplify the whole situation, that if they would pass the pending paragraph, and after it is concluded then read the succeeding paragraph, beginning with line 20, page 21, and at the conclusion of that if we would adopt the motion of the gentleman from Virginia and let the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska and the committee amendment be added, the whole situation would be made clear, and then you can amend the totals corresponding with the fact, and the committee can vote intelligently upon the matter. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, has my substitute been reported by the Clerk?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "thirty" and insert "sixty-five;" so as to read: "Four hundred and sixty-five thousand two hundred and sixty dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is what I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from North Dakota.

The Clerk read as follows:

Increase the amount of the substitute of the gentleman from New York, by increasing the amount $25,000; so as to read: "Four hundred and ninety thousand two hundred and sixty dollars."

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to increase this total as suggested by the substitute of the gentleman from New York, by the amount of $25,000, to be used for a purpose outlined in a bill (H. R. 8753) which I introduced and which has been pending before the Agricultural Committee. The bill provided—

That there be appropriated, out of the public moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for all expenses necessary to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate methods of dry-land farming suited to the arid and semiarid regions of the Western United States, where irrigation is impracticable, the sum of $60,000, of which sum $5,000 shall be immediately available.

Upon my request, this bill was referred to the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, and upon that bill he made the following report:

It is the evident intention of the framer of this bill to provide additional funds for the development and extension of the work in dry-land farming already begun under an appropriation made last session for cereal investigations. This work has developed so rapidly and the demands from the people in the semiarid portions of the country have become so urgent within the last few months that it is now evident that additional funds will be necessary if the work is to be developed to the extent demanded by the conditions which exist in this vast area which can not be reclaimed by irrigation but which must be utilized by some method of dry-land farming in order to provide homes for the people who are flocking to these unoccupied lands in such numbers, and to prevent as far as possible the disastrous failures that have heretofore been the result of attempts to settle this region.

I have a number of times called attention in my annual report to the importance of this line of investigation.

Now, mind you, these are the words of the Secretary of Agriculture.

And I believe that if this bill (H. R. 8753) be incorporated in the general appropriation act of the Department much needed work could be done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I appeared before the committee and made a strong statement of the conditions prevailing in an immense tract of country, about 200 miles in width, which extends from the Canada line to the Gulf of Mexico. For several years preliminary work has been in progress by the Department of Agriculture in the study of dry-land agriculture. Nearly one-third of the area of the United States has insufficient rainfall for the best culture of the ordinary crop plants. It has been pointed out in previous reports that after all possible extension is made of irrigation there must remain enormous areas, approximating a fourth of the entire land surface of this country, which will necessarily remain perpetually in their present arid or semiarid condition for want of an adequate supply of water for irrigation. Dry farming is a necessity in order to utilize such lands where irrigation can never be practiced. Enough preliminary work has now been accomplished to show that large areas of such dry but often extremely fertile lands can ultimately be utilized by adopting systems of dry farming and cultural methods and specially adapted crop plants. To carry out the introduction of new industries in such regions it is necessary to study most carefully the life history of each particular crop which it is desired to introduce in order to determine with some degree of accuracy its needs as to climate and soil and its cultural requirements and the best methods of marketing or otherwise utilizing its products. It is believed that a careful investigation of this whole subject will establish methods and systems and determine the crops suited to build up agricultural industries on a safe basis in such regions.

The simple facts are, gentlemen, that a vast area of country extending, as I have said, from the Canadian line to the Gulf of Mexico has recently been and is being settled up rapidly to homesteaders, and throughout that region there is what may be termed an "area of doubtful rainfall," the rain averaging from 10 to 15 and possibly, in some small sections, 20 inches per annum. Owing to a few recent extra good years the people have been pouring in there, but unless some remedy is found for the prevailing conditions many of them will suffer and be obliged to desert their homes.

Now, at the same time that my bill was considered by the honorable Committee on Agriculture there were one or two other bills of a somewhat similar character considered, and out of these grew some confusion. The other bills provided for experiments to be carried on by the Bureau of Experiment Stations, and the Committee on Agriculture have provided, in the language of their bill, $25,000 to be used for this purpose. That item comes under the next heading, of "Experiment stations."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from North Dakota may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I object.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Now, since the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] can not proceed, I desire to offer a few suggestions along the line of his amendment. If I can't get time for him, I will take up the subject myself. I should like to have the attention of the Members of the House briefly while I call their attention to some conditions existing in the western part of our country that his amendment seeks to reach.

In the western part of our country there is a large section that from its very nature can not be brought under irrigation, a section that has rainfall enough during a year to raise a crop, but because the rainfall comes at such irregular intervals—sometimes too much and often not enough—there results a failure of crops. This soil is of the richest in the world. Scientific investigation and experimentation have demonstrated that during a long dry spell there are perpendicular pores formed in this soil terminating at the surface of the ground, and through these pores the moisture reaches the surface and passes off by evaporation. Scientists have demonstrated in various ways, notably by what has become known as the "Campbell system," that if these pores can be broken up and this evaporation prevented this moisture in the soil can be used in the sustenance of plant life, for the production of crops.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment. This method, recently discovered, has been designated as "dry farming" in that portion of our country where irrigation can not be had and where there is not sufficient rainfall at all seasons of the year to produce a crop, and these experiments have been made mainly by private parties, with the idea of conserving the moisture in the soil and using it at times when no moisture comes in the shape of rain, for the purpose of feeding and caring for the crops that grow on the land. This amendment seeks to appropriate money for the Department of Agriculture to continue those experiments. It has been determined already that where the rainfall comes in vast quantities so that it passes off by evaporation or otherwise before it is used by the crop growing in the soil, and then the seasons of dry weather coming on that the crop fails, when, as a matter of fact, during the season there has been sufficient rainfall to produce the best of crops. Experiments have shown, carried on mainly by private parties in some of the western portions of the country, that this moisture can be conserved in the soil by what is known as "surface cultivation," and that a large rainfall will be conserved in the soil, and by surface cultivation and other methods of cultivation it will be prevented from evaporating, so that it will pass through to the roots of the crop growing on the land and by that means produce a crop.

Now, I want to say that a few years ago I went out in the western part of my State, when we had a long dry spell, and looked at two crops of corn, with nothing in the world between them but a wire fence. One had been experimented with in this way and was perfectly green, without a dead stalk, and while the ground on the top appeared to be dry, by scratching under the surface an inch or 2 inches the soil was so moist that you could mix it into a ball. Just over the fence the other corn crop was cultivated in the usual way, and it was perfectly dead, and would have burned if you had touched a match to it. Now, there is a vast scope of territory of this kind, and it is for the purpose of developing the best methods and experimenting with those methods of cultivation that will be the means of making all this territory produce crops that this appropriation is desired. Now, I will yield to my friend from South Carolina.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wanted to ask if this experiment is not already being carried on at the experimental stations in this country?

Mr. NORRIS. No; they are not carried on at all of them, although they are in some. This amendment is for the purpose of providing funds for carrying them on upon a larger scale. In my judgment it will be the means of making productive a very large scope of country that heretofore has been considered useless for agricultural purposes, and that has been used only as grazing land. It will eventually redeem millions of acres of land heretofore of little value, and provide pleasant homes and profitable farms for thousands of our people. In my judgment there is no item in this bill that will be productive of more beneficial results.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska, to strike out the last word. I verily believe, Mr. Chairman, that the Agricultural Committee would have included this item in their bill had it not been for some confusion in regard to the matter. It will be understood that Doctor True, the head of the experiment station work, carries on certain work along the lines of irrigation with which we are all familiar. Doctor Galloway, who is at the head of the Bureau of Plant Industry, carried on certain other experiments of an entirely different character. Now, in order to explain that, I am going to read from pages 790 and 791 of the hearings before the committee. Doctor True says:

I am informed that owing to the broad phraseology of the bills covering this subject which have recently been before your committee there has been some fear of duplication of work or of conflict between the Office of Experiment Stations and the Bureau of Plant Industry on this matter. I am glad to say that, as regards our respective lines of work, Doctor Galloway and myself have a good understanding and are prepared to avoid duplication or conflict.

It is not the intention of the Office of Experiment Stations to engage at all in what is ordinarily called "dry farming." That belongs to the Bureau of Plant Industry, whose work includes all matters relating to varieties of crops and methods of cultivation. The Office of Experiment Stations, through its division of rural engineering, will deal exclusively with experimental work in irrigation, drainage, pumping, and farm machinery. Of course on tracts where we are testing methods of irrigation we shall grow crops, but they will be ordinary crops of the region, or those which we are advised to grow by the Bureau of Plant Industry. We shall not make crop experiments. The respective lines of work of these two bureaus are clearly differentiated.

The difficulty has arisen from the broad phraseology of the bills before your committee, which undoubtedly covers the field of both bureaus. * * *

What it needs is money. When you have decided what more you will appropriate for the object of these bills, give Doctor Galloway his share for the dry-farming experiments and give me my share for Mr. Mead's work in irrigation in the semiarid region.

Now, it is to clear up this subject that I have read this testimony. I believe that if this testimony had been fully brought to the attention of each member of the committee there would have been no question but that this item which I am asking for would have been included in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the facts as disclosed by the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture that the work which it is proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota to do is already being done and is fully provided for in the present appropriation. On page 158 of the hearings I asked Mr. Woods, who was then before the committee, this question:

Mr. SCOTT. At these substations you are studying what they call "dry farming?"

Mr. WOODS. That leads into a very important branch of dry farming, and for a number of years we have been looking out and trying to get good crops which are adapted for agricultural use in this area, which for a number of years at a time may have a very low rainfall, only 10 or 12 inches. The cultivation methods there are mainly for the purpose of conserving the moisture.

Mr. SCOTT. And are you conducting experiments all the way down from the Dakotas to Texas which involve the art of dry farming?

Mr. WOODS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. I asked that question particularly because there is a bill before this committee to make a special appropriation for carrying on experiments in dry farming, and it occurs to me that if the Department is already doing that work in such a way as to develop whatever the facts may warrant it would not be necessary to make a special appropriation for it.

The CHAIRMAN. That question of cultivation comes under this item. What are the experiment stations in all of these States doing?

Mr. WOODS. They are cooperating with us very heartily.

The CHAIRMAN. And are you working in cooperation with them?

Mr. WOODS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Where are you making actual experiments—experiments in the actual growing of the wheats?

Mr. WOODS. Those experiments are being conducted at Dickinson and Edgely, N. Dak.; Highmore, S. Dak.; North Platte, Nebr.; Hays and Garden City, Kans.; Channing and Amarillo, Tex., as well as several other points between the ninety-eighth and one hundred and fourth meridians.

The CHAIRMAN. That is under the control of the experiment stations, and the Department is acting in an advisory capacity every year and furnishing the money to help the experiments along?

Mr. WOODS. Yes, sir. We put an expert there to carry out our part of the work. The stations assist by furnishing the land and furnishing the ordinary labor and the buildings, and so forth, and we look after the scientific part of it.

This makes it clear, I am sure, that under the present appropriation the work asked for by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] is already being thoroughly and carefully done.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad indeed that the gentleman from Kansas read that testimony. The work is being carried on out of the funds for cereal investigations, which was covered by a bill that I introduced at the last session and which was incorporated in the appropriation bill by the Senate; a total of about $5,000 has been used out of the $25,000 and has been spread out among nine stations in the United States—a mere bagatelle, simply starting the work which the amount I now propose to add to this bill will extend. It is true that it is carried on in cooperation with State experiment stations, and that is exactly what I want, only I want to carry on the work more systematically and on a somewhat broader and more permanent plan.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the work is already being done on a large scale all through the semiarid regions, and it can not be done all at once. The only thing that can be done is to conduct the experiments at the different places throughout the arid regions in order to demonstrate the feasibility of the project, and that is being done now.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] to the amendment offered by the chairman of the committee may be adopted. I believe that the work contemplated under that amendment is second only in importance to the great work of irrigation in the same region in which the Government is now expending millions of dollars. There lies between the Canadian line and Mexico, about the one-hundredth meridian, millions of acres of land having a rainfall of from 14 to 20 inches, not sufficient for the growth of crops under the ordinary methods of cultivation, not sufficient for the assured growth of the varieties of crops which have heretofore been generally grown in the same latitude farther east in that region, taking one year with another.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that there are 300,000,000 acres on the high plains in the territory he speaks of.

Mr. MONDELL. In addition to this great region which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] says contains 300,000,000 acres there are scattered all through the States and Territories known and recognized as being generally arid considerable isolated areas having sufficient rainfall and soil of such character that agriculture can be carried on by improved methods and careful selection of crops advantageously and profitably. This vast region consists very largely of Government lands, lands to which we are now inviting the home seeker, lands that will make homes for the people of the East and the Central States now moving westward. Much has been accomplished in demonstrating what can be done in so-called "dry farming."

Already considerable areas have been conquered from the desert and successfully farmed, and it is proposed now to further extend the aid the Government has heretofore been giving to this great work of extending the nation's farm area by increasing this appropriation. It is true that the committee, after the hearings on this subject, did add $20,000 or $25,000 to the appropriation made for the division of irrigation and drainage investigations of the Bureau of Experiment Stations. That appropriation will assist in the development of dry farming as an auxiliary to the development of small irrigated farms. That was the purpose of that appropriation.

The Bureau of Experiment Stations is already doing and has done an exceedingly valuable work in this field, and in order that the splendid work carried on by the division of irrigation of the Office of Experiment Stations, and which should be under the charge of that Office, may be supplemented by the Bureau of Plant Industry it is proposed to add to the appropriation of that Bureau the sum of $25,000; and the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. MARSHALL] has well said that this is a mere bagatelle when we take into consideration the valuable character of the work to be done, the vast extent of territory over which it can and ought to be carried on, and the thousands of homes that it will make possible on lands now popularly supposed to be available only for grazing purposes. Great as will be the development by irrigation ultimately in the United States, in my opinion, based on considerable experience in the western country, we will ultimately conquer from the desert, at least advance from grazing lands of small value to farming lands supporting comfortably large populations, many more acres by dry farming than we can reclaim by irrigation, owing to the limited water supply available for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Virginia to withhold that motion for one minute until the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS], on the committee, has an opportunity to make an explanation.

Mr. LAMB. Very well; I will yield to the gentleman for one minute.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, it is true that the bill as reported carries $25,000 for the item of dry farming. That is on page 51 of the bill, under the drainage investigation, and the language of the text is as follows: "With especial suggestions of the best method for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture." Now, the language is perhaps not very specific, but in the opinion of the Department it covered that particular feature.

Mr. MARSHALL. Do you pretend for one moment that that item covers the proposition I have offered here as an amendment?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I think I can answer that frankly, and I will. Mr. Chairman, there were, I think, eight or ten——

Mr. NORRIS. Before the gentleman does that, will he point out the location of this language? I would like to read the language myself.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. On page 51, lines 2 and 3.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes; certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand the gentleman is opposed to a further appropriation for the work of dry farming experiments.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I am on the Agricultural Committee, and the committee, at my suggestion, made the appropriation which I have alluded to, and I am bound to stand by my committee; but I want to answer frankly the question of the gentleman from North Dakota. There were six or seven bills introduced covering features of dry farming. Now, three or four of those bills had reference to the irrigation side of the subject and three or four of them had reference to the cultural-method side of it. The gentleman from North Dakota introduced a bill covering the cultural methods—that is to say, the cropping treatment of the soil and the systems of dry farming, which are being considered at this time; and the other class of bills had reference to the storage of inadequate surface water supply, the making available of subterranean water, and that class of work.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman whether there was an appropriation made for the bill I introduced, providing $10,000 for experimental purposes in Texas? Was there any provision made relative to that bill? I understood it was to be taken care of and put in in an omnibus appropriation.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. There was; and the gentleman from Texas introduced one of the bills of the class which I have just described—that is to say, having particular reference to the cultivation of land where the water supply was inadequate to raise ordinary crops.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Virginia moves that debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will allow Mr. BROOKS, a member of the committee, to finish.

Mr. LAMB. For how long a time?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Three minutes; and, Mr. Chairman, before I go on——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia withdraw his motion?

Mr. LAMB. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I would ask unanimous consent to extend my previous remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado yield?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. I yield for a question, but I have but a few moments now.

Mr. MARSHALL. In order to clear up this matter will the gentleman kindly explain how he expects an appropriation under the head of "Office of Experiment Stations" to be added to the Bureau of Plant Industry? Now, if you will clear up that question it will settle the whole thing.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. The gentleman asks a difficult question, but I think I can answer it. The whole work is one, but it has two phases. One is Doctor Galloway's work and the other is Mr. Mead's work. Now, as the gentleman from Kansas said, Doctor Galloway's work is to some extent covered by the general appropriations for his Bureau, but it is not covered by this specific appropriation for Mead's work. There is no question about that, and I do not want to mislead the committee. What I am trying to say is this, that the bill carried an increase of $25,000 for one phase of dry farming. That is all I can say. This increase, on page 51, does not cover the matter of improved cultural methods on which Doctor Galloway is working.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does this cover Professor Mead's system of dry farming?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. It does, and I will say further that in drafting the amendment to page 51, which incorporated the terms of the bill which I introduced on this subject, I consulted Mr. Mead, and he thought it was adequate for everything wanted for his work.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. To sum up, then, there were two phases of this work before this committee, but they both had reference to dry farming, and we added $25,000 to the bill for Mr. Mead's work.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I renew my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia moves that the debate be now closed.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Nebraska rise?

Mr. POLLARD. To ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment. There is a great deal of confusion——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 18, page 21, strike out the words "three hundred and eighty-nine" and insert the words "four hundred and fourteen."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is an amendment which the gentleman offers to the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska and my amendment to the amendment. The subject has been thoroughly debated. I hope it will not prevail. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MARSHALL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BONYNGE. Before the question is put, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a parliamentary question. What is the motion that is now being submitted to the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there is objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk reread the amendment.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Chairman, if I understand, that is an increase of $25,000 for dry farming?

Then, on motion of Mr. MARSHALL, the committee divided; and the Chair announced—ayes 44, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as a new paragraph, and I wish to have it considered as pending.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it can not be received at this time.

Mr. PALMER. I do not ask to have it considered before the paragraph offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to that paragraph.

Mr. MURPHY. I have an amendment to offer to that paragraph, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending paragraph?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I insist that while a point of order is pending that the gentleman can not offer an amendment.

Mr. PALMER. Yes, he can.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," on line 9, page 21, insert: "Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized and directed to expend $5,000 of the amount hereby appropriated to especially investigate parasites and orchard diseases prevalent in the Ozark Mountain region of the State of Missouri, and to work out, if possible, in cooperation with the fruit experiment station at Mountain Grove, the problem of prevention of such diseases and destruction of parasites and diffuse information along these lines."

Mr. HAY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. HAY. I understand that is an amendment to the paragraph just read.

The CHAIRMAN. The preceding paragraph, which has been perfected.

Mr. POWERS. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. In case the new paragraph offered by the gentleman from Virginia——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that we have not reached that paragraph yet.

Mr. POWERS. Will this section after that be opened to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. We have not reached that paragraph yet. The Chair will answer that when we come to it. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, debate by motion has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been closed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] may have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] may have five minutes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURPHY. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and the Chair announced that there were—ayes 65, noes 46.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Tellers! Mr. Chairman, I do not think the House understands——

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman from New York to order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask for tellers. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MURPHY] will take their places as tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers proceeded to count.

Mr. WADSWORTH (during the count). I withdraw the demand for the vote by tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the yeas are 65, the noes are 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any more amendments to the pending paragraph? If not, the question will come on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On that I make the point of order that it is new legislation and that it is not warranted by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has offered an amendment, which has been read, to which the gentleman from New York reserves the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, this amendment has become necessary by reason of the fact that the Committee on Agriculture one morning in a merry mood, on a motion tentatively made, suggested that we strike out of the appropriation bill the item carrying a certain amount for seed. Not one word was heard before the committee from anyone advocating or opposing this seed distribution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I make the point of order that the gentleman is not speaking to the point of order, and that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] demanded the regular order.

Mr. LAMB. I will discuss the point of order. Do not fear about that, my friend.

On the morning referred to a gentleman on our committee, who comes from Long Island [Mr. COCKS], moved to strike that appropriation out in equally a jocular mood, and the able, amiable, and venerable chairman of this committee seconded it, and on that vote it stood 8 to 7—a historical number in this glorious country of ours. [Laughter and applause.] The next morning a member of the committee moved to take that resolution from the table, where it had been placed, and reconsider it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am compelled to call the gentleman to order. He is not debating the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I am coming to the point of order. Be patient please.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be in order. The Chair will be glad to hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I hope the Chairman will not press that, because I am going to discuss the point of order immediately. Nothing was said here in all the skirmish yesterday on this point at all. No member of the committee has disclosed——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York insists upon the point of order. The gentleman from Virginia will discuss the point of order.

Mr. LAMB. Well, I will not offend any more, as the gentleman said the other day, under like conditions.

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is not contrary to existing law. Here is the law. It is not new; it is existing to-day and has existed for fully forty years. On May 15, 1862, this law was enacted:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby established at the seat of government of the United States a Department of Agriculture, the general designs and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word, and to procure, propagate, and distribute among the people new and valuable seeds and plants.

Within a few months of that time, in the same Congress, in fact, the following appropriation was made:

For collection of agricultural statistics, investigations for promoting agricultural and rural economy, and the procurement, propagation, and distribution of cuttings and seeds, $60,000: Provided, however, That in the expenditure of this appropriation, and especially in the selection of cuttings and seeds for distribution, due regard shall be had to the purposes of general cultivation, and the encouragement of the agricultural and rural interests of all parts of the United States.

Now, is that sufficient? Does not that satisfy any reasonable man here of the correctness of the position I take, that this amendment is germane and that it can not be subject to a point of order? The chairman of this committee, in his report, makes use of this language:

The item covering the Congressional free distribution of vegetable and flower seed has been entirely omitted from the bill. There is not and never has been any warrant of law for such expenditure.

And yet for ten years, since I have been here, we have been making this appropriation against law and precedent, according to this report, for this very purpose.

Mr. Chairman, it does seem a huge pity that a subject like this, so momentous to the people of this country and particularly to the 7,000,000 who till the soil, should be decided and perhaps terminated by an appeal to a point of order. [Applause.] But we are not without precedents in this case. Every gentleman who was in the last Congress remembers when a point of order was made by my friend from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] was in the chair, that this very question was discussed. I will not stop here to read the ruling of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] on that occasion, because so many of these gentlemen who are interested in this subject have read it and know just as much about it as I do. The ruling is familiar. Mr. Chairman, you can not rule against us in this matter unless you overrule the decision of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] in an exactly analogous case, one standing on all fours with this. I desire to call your attention to the fact that the very exceptions that were made in that case have been obviated in this amendment that I have offered, and there is no reason on earth why any man who may happen to be in the chair should sustain this point of order. There are others here who have studied this question and are prepared to speak.

I have submitted briefly, as pointedly as I know how, and with all the lamb-like modesty that I possess, the arguments in favor of this amendment and against this point of order. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not care to say anything on the point of order. There is nothing in the organic law providing for this seed distribution, and I based my point of order on this fact. I think even the Department itself has always held that there was no authority for this seed distribution except that granted by the appropriation bill.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] has referred to a ruling of mine, made four years ago, when a similar section was in the agricultural appropriation bill, I desire to make a few remarks upon my ruling and on the point of order by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Now, first of all, in order that we may fully understand whether this amendment is or is not subject to a point of order, it might be well to read the statute authorizing the purchase and distribution of seeds, and if you will pardon me I will read it.

It reads as follows:

The purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, to such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of the country to another—

Which applies to all the seeds, in my judgment, as a change from one section of the country to another of similar seeds is often attended with beneficial results—and the purchase, propagation, and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings, shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation, and to promote the general interests of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

Now, that that statute authorizes the purchase of seeds no one can deny. That it authorizes the distribution of seeds no one can deny. A reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show that I ruled out of order a paragraph which contained a proposition directing another branch of the Government, or another Department or bureau—in short, the Public Printer—to furnish franks and to do certain things in reference to the distribution of seeds when there was and is no statute imposing this duty, because I believe that that was not justifiable and was clearly within the prohibition of the rule forbidding new legislation upon an appropriation bill. But the question arises here and now, there being a statute of the United States which authorizes the purchase and distribution of these seeds, may we not specify in this appropriation bill, and may we not in an amendment to it direct what that Department shall do, the method it shall adopt, what course it shall take, and how it shall make that distribution? If we may do that, and I submit it seems to me we can, then the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia simply carries out and gives effect to the provisions of the statute, and, I think, is not subject to a point of order.

If, however, after the statutes of our country authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute seeds, cuttings, and so forth, we can not specify the manner and the agencies and methods which shall be used by him in any distribution which he shall make, then perhaps the proposed new section is subject to a point of order. Now, I believe that while the law or the rule which makes legislation on an appropriation bill subject to a point of order is generally wise, especially when applied to subjects not germane to the bill under consideration, yet when the amendment offered is germane to the subject-matter as this is, if there are any doubts as to whether it is subject to a point of order or not, they should be resolved in favor of permitting the submission of that amendment, or, as in this case, new section, to a vote of this House in Committee of the Whole. [Applause.]

I do not think that a careful examination of my ruling at that time will make it necessary for the present Chairman to rule in conflict with my decision in deciding to sustain the point of order, as I ruled out the section for the reason before specified and gave no opinion as to the portions now before the House, upon which the point is now raised; yet I wish to call the attention of this committee to the fact that there is nothing, in my judgment, in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia that is not necessary and required for a proper distribution of these seeds, which distribution he is authorized by the statute to make, and I believe can legally make through the agencies and in the manner set forth in the section offered by the gentleman from Virginia, and I wish to impress upon the Members of this House again the fact that the amendment is germane to this appropriation bill and, in my judgment, does not change existing law or enact new law or impose any limitation or restriction upon the Secretary of Agriculture exercising all his perogatives.

I wish also to refer to the other fact—let it have what weight it may—that the ruling I made four years ago was made at the request and instance of the gentleman who makes the point of order against this amendment. [Laughter.] That ruling was acquiesced in not only by him, but by the committee. He took advantage of it when it was in his favor, and the Committee on Agriculture have placed it in all their appropriation bills since that time except the present one.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Maine has said that the ruling was made at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee. I would like to inquire if it was made because the chairman of the committee requested it, or because it was the opinion of the gentleman from Maine, who was in the chair?

Mr. POWERS. I will say that the subject was one not free from doubt, and I so stated at the time; but I acted upon the principle, which I have tried to impress upon the committee, that where a matter is germane to the appropriation bill under consideration I resolve that doubt in favor of permitting the committee to consider it upon its merits and to vote upon it rather than take it from them by an arbitrary ruling of doubtful validity.

Now, the paragraph in the bill which was ruled upon then and which was sustained by the action of the committee, I am informed, is similar to that which has been in many bills before, and is identical with that which has been in three or four appropriation bills which have preceded this one. That paragraph, after it had been amended by the chairman of the Agricultural Committee, and the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia are identical. Now, understand me, I held the whole section bad in the first instance on the ground that it prescribed certain things to be done by the Printing Bureau, which was clearly new legislation, and as that portion was subject to a point of order, the whole section had to be ruled out, and after that had been stricken out the chairman of the committee offered the same paragraph with that part eliminated and no contest was made as to its validity.

Mr. LAMB. That very language to which the gentleman refers is erased from this amendment.

Mr. POWERS. I know that. I said that it was identical with the paragraph after the objectionable matter was stricken out. After that the committee not only adopted the section with that stricken out, but, by unanimous consent, to the end that Members might have the privilege of using their franks, they put back the objectionable part into the section.

I have no feeling or pride of opinion about this matter. I do not know as I ruled right. I acted under the best light I had at the time, and I acted in a way that would let the committee have a chance to pass upon the paragraph. I believe that the extreme restriction which takes away from consideration of this House matter on the ground that it is new legislation—matters that are really germane to the bill under consideration—I believe that power should be used with caution, and that proposed amendments should be construed with great liberality. Having made this statement and having no wish, purpose, or desire to ask that anyone be influenced by what I may have ruled, only to consider that this same legislation has been in the bill ever since, and that it was the view of the House at that time, I leave the matter with the chairman of the committee, having every confidence that a right conclusion will be reached.

Mr. JAMES. I would like to ask the gentleman if any appeal was ever taken from his decision?

Mr. POWERS. No appeal was ever taken, and up to the present time the Agricultural Committee and the Committee of the Whole House, by their acts at least, have ratified and confirmed it.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, independent of the question of the wisdom or unwisdom, the propriety or impropriety, of the subject-matter of this paragraph, the question of order is one of considerable importance. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to a provision found in volume 18 of the Statutes at Large, page 343, to which attention perhaps has not been called:

That seed transmitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture or for any Member of Congress or Delegate receiving seeds for distribution from the seed department, together with agricultural books emanating from the Department and so transmitted, shall, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, pass through the mails free of charge. The provisions of this section shall apply to ex-Members of Congress and ex-Delegates for the period of five months after the expiration of their terms as Members and Delegates.

That is found in the act of March 3, 1875, and is permanent legislation. Now, if I understand it, the paragraph which the gentleman from Virginia has offered is taken verbatim from a provision in the agricultural appropriation bill as passed at the last session in 1905. It seems to me that the point of order raised is a very delicate question which may not be entirely free from doubt. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that that provision which begins "an equal proportion of two-thirds of all seeds, bulbs, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants shall, upon their request, after due notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the allotment to their respective districts is ready for distribution, be supplied to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress for distribution among their constituents," as found in the appropriation bill of 1905, may be fairly construed to be in the nature of permanent law.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not quite certain that the preceding part of the provision, which, as I understand, is at the commencement of the paragraph offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB], containing this language: "And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend said sum of money" in such and such directions. It is possible that that, being a limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary not found in existing law, may make the whole paragraph subject to the point of order. If, however, you construe it as a mere limitation upon this appropriation, of course the point is not good.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the statute anywhere vest this discretion in the Secretary? There is no law vesting the discretion that is contained in the provision the gentleman has just quoted from in the Secretary of Agriculture, is there?

Mr. OLMSTED. Then clearly this is a change of existing law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a direction of an appropriation that Congress made—a direction within a purpose allowed by law, and therefore clearly a limitation.

Mr. OLMSTED. But, in my opinion, the act creating the Department authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds in his own discretion as to the manner thereof. This particular language seems to be a limitation upon that discretion. It is perhaps an immaterial part of the amendment. It is a matter that, if the Chair shall rule the paragraph out of order, can be very readily corrected by offering a paragraph omitting the objectionable portion, and that would be clearly not subject to the point of order. That being the case, there is really not very much to be gained, I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], by taking up the time of the committee in the discussion of this point of order. It seems to me that it is a fairly debatable question, very close. I personally feel that except for the limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary the paragraph might safely be held in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania refer again to the language of that limitation which he has in mind?

Mr. OLMSTED. I am reading from the appropriation act of 1905, which I understand to be identical with the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. It says that the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend said sum in such and such manner. It seems to me that if there was a simple appropriation of this amount of money in the language of the act of Congress that is permanent law, the Secretary of Agriculture could readily treat the balance of the act of 1905 as permanent law for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The second volume of the Supplement to the Federal Statutes, that contains all that the compiler regarded as permanent law that is carried in appropriation bills, carries this same provision as permanent legislation. That is, I think, on page 1513 of the second volume of supplements and on another page.

Mr. DALZELL. Which provision is that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All this provision that might be freely termed "legislation." There is one other thing, with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I desire to say in connection with that provision which he has been discussing, that the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to expend said sum "as nearly as practicable." Now, who determines whether it be practicable? It still vests that discretion in the Secretary of Agriculture. I think it is a legitimate and proper limitation upon the expenditure of money.

Mr. OLMSTED. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no controversy between the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and myself as to the paragraph he finds on page 1513 of the supplement. That is exactly what I stated may in my judgment be construed to be permanent law. The only question that troubles me is the direction to the Secretary to expend the money in a certain direction, in possible limitation of the discretion now conferred upon him by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman what he says about this provision: That the person receiving such seed may be requested to inform the Department of the results of experiments therewith, and so on?

Mr. OLMSTED. That, I think, is part of permanent law today. I think it is unnecessary in the paragraph, but I do not think its presence makes the paragraph subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to call the attention of the gentleman to the language "and the person receiving such seeds," apparently the seeds referred to in the very appropriation bill—the very seeds provided for in the appropriation bill.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the privilege of amending that by using the word "authorized" instead of the word "directed," and it seems to me that that would correct the trouble weighing on the gentleman's mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is not in order at the present time. Debate is proceeding on a point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, that seems to me to refer to the seeds allotted in that provision which I construe to be permanent law to-day. The principal difficulty that I have with this is in the direction which seems to control the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, which he might have under existing law, and it is such a close and narrow question and so easily corrected by another amendment that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] might or might not feel like insisting on his point of order.

Mr. LAMB. I ask for a ruling, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to alternate between those supporting the point of order and those opposing it, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to support the point of order the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, just a word. If I were called upon to decide this question upon the language of the statutes as they are printed under the head of the "Department of Agriculture," to wit, section 520 and sections 526 and 527, I should say without doubt the point of order ought to be sustained for the reason that so far as section 520 is concerned it was evidently in contemplation of the legislature that the Secretary of Agriculture should have the distribution himself, as the head of the Department, of a particular and limited kind of seed, not the general distribution contemplated by this amendment, and it seems to me that that idea is further emphasized by the language of section 526, and especially by the language of section 527.

Purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another.

Now, as I say, if the point of order was to be decided simply upon those statutes which relate to the Department of Agriculture it seems to me clear the point of order ought to be sustained. That is to say, those statutes seem to contemplate the distribution by the Department direct, not through the intervention of any other party, and a distribution of a particular kind of seed, not the kind of seed that is contemplated by the amendment offered. If, however, what the gentleman from Indiana says is true, and if the language of the appropriation bill of 1905 is upon the statute books as a permanent statute, so recognized by those entitled to say what shall go upon the statute book as permanent, then it seems to me it would be a very doubtful question. Now, it is for the Chair to say what effect shall be given to the alleged statute quoted by the gentleman from Indiana. If that be the law, then the amendment, in my judgment, is not a change of law. If that be not the law, and the point of order is to be decided simply upon the language creating the Department of Agriculture and defining its duties, then, in my judgment, the point of order ought to be sustained. In any event it seems to me a very doubtful question.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the point of order the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists should be sustained is that it is provided in the original enabling act of the Department of Agriculture that these seeds should be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture and the provision of the existing amendment provides that they shall be distributed by Members of Congress.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if this is not the fact, that the enabling act of the Department of Agriculture first provides for the purchase and distribution of seeds, and that that is an entity to itself independent of the question of distribution by the Secretary of Agriculture; and if that is so, has not Congress power to provide for the purchase and distribution of seed and then limit that appropriation, as it can limit all other appropriations that Congress makes? If we purchase a battle ship, we can limit it by saying that the ship shall be built in a certain navy-yard, or that the ship be made of wood or iron. In the same way, does not the enabling act of the Department of Agriculture provide temporarily for the purchase and distribution of seed and rare plants, and then if Congress in its wisdom desires to limit that by providing that it shall be distributed by Members of Congress, by the governors of the States, or any other way, can not we direct on a particular appropriation bill how that particular money shall be expended? I do not think there is any doubt about that decision.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, there is no doubt at all about the power of Congress in the premises. That is not the question involved here. The question is as to whether Congress can legislate in a particular way—to wit, upon an appropriation bill, and the question here is whether or not this is not new legislation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But is it not a limitation when we provide for the expenditure of money to purchase and distribute seed then to provide how the seed purchased under this particular act—not in the future, but these seeds that are to be purchased by this appropriation—are to be distributed. It is a limitation and not new legislation, and I say that the decisions of the House repeatedly have held that.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I should not agree with the gentleman that it is a limitation. I think that the doctrine of limitation has been stretched beyond all reason already, and that would be going a step further.

Mr. OLMSTED. I desire to ask my colleague what bearing he thinks the act of March 3, 1875, would have? I read it, perhaps, in his absence.

Mr. DALZELL. I was not here, and I did not hear it.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is a provision of permanent law that states that—

Seeds transmitted by the Commissioner of Agriculture or by any Member of Congress or Delegate receiving seeds for distribution from said Department, together with agricultural reports emanating from that Department, and so transmitted, shall, under such regulations as the Postmaster-General may prescribe, pass through the mails free of charge.

The provisions of this section shall apply to ex-Members of Congress and ex-Delegates for a period of nine months after the expiration of their term as Members and Delegates.

Mr. DALZELL. I would say that that was an enlargement of the authority conferred by the organic act, and it seems to me it is such a close question, Mr. Chairman, that it is unfortunate that the Chair has to be called on to rule upon it, especially in view of the temper of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, in view of what has been said I will withdraw the point of order. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. LAMB were appointed tellers.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 153, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

[Applause.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment by way of a new paragraph, which amendment the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That a Member may, upon his request, be allotted his entire quota in field seeds, such as cotton, corn, wheat, alfalfa, rye, clover, tobacco, and so forth, in plants, grass seed, vine cuttings, and so forth, or in such proportions of field seeds, vegetable seeds, plants, grass seeds, vine cuttings, and the like as he may designate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it has been impossible to hear the amendment read, and without hearing it I shall have to reserve the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk reread the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that provision. It seems to me that it is going a good deal further than we have gone before, and it seems to me a positive provision. They do it whenever you want them to do it now, do they not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. You are confined now to vegetables and flower seeds. This extends the scope so you can supply other kinds of seed—valuable seeds.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer that as an addition to the amendments already made?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Just simply as a new section of that amendment, an amendment to the section just adopted. Technically, however, it is a new paragraph or section of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB] has been adopted by the House. That provision is not subject to an original amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. This is not an original amendment.

Mr. MANN. An amendment that is offered now must stand upon its merits, so far as new legislation is concerned.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly. It stands as a separate paragraph. In reality, however, it is connected with the paragraph preceding it, enlarges its scope and enables Members to distribute field seeds whenever field seeds are desired by the people of their respective districts.

Mr. MANN. It extends the scope of the Congressional seed distribution?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. For that reason I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It extends the distribution so as to include valuable seeds.

Mr. MANN. I think the Secretary ought to comply with the original law.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will allow a question, I will state that this amendment vests in the Members of Congress severally the right to designate the kind of seeds that shall be purchased. It is a radical change in the present methods of selecting, because it gives to each Senator and Representative the right to say what particular kind of seeds shall be sent into his district, and it certainly changes existing law. There never has been a provision authorizing selection in that manner, and there is none in the present bill. There is none in the amendment that has been adopted, and it seems to me it would be the most embarrassing thing that could be done as a matter of policy.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My intention is to provide that the Secretary may, in his discretion, make the desired distribution on the request and designation of a Member.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, then, as a few Members may require a particular kind of seed the selection or designation is a matter of legislation that would have to be made before the Secretary of Agriculture made his purchase at all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Indeed, that is what I hope shall be done.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The amendment does not provide it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It follows by implication. At any rate, the amendment expresses my position, and I shall endeavor to secure its enactment into law in some other way, if it can not be inserted here.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I certainly think the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to inquire of the gentleman from Texas whether he offers this amendment as an additional amendment to the one that has just been adopted or as a new paragraph?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I offer it as a new section. The recent amendment has already been voted on.

Mr. MANN. A new paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. If it is a new paragraph, the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to go back to line 19, page 21, and offer the committee amendment increasing the appropriation $76,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to return to the page indicated? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from New York offers the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out three hundred and eighty-nine and insert four hundred and sixty-five, so as to read "$465,260."

Mr. POLLARD. I have not the sum total of the figures, but I move to substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York that the amount be increased $125,000. That takes care of the matter I was presenting to the House a while ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding $50,000, so as to make it read "$515,260."

Mr. LIVINGSTON. A parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CANDLER. I will ask the gentleman if the totals have been added to so as to include the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair refers the gentleman to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CANDLER. Do you change the total?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We have not yet; but they will be changed when we reach them.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. With the understanding, Mr. Chairman, that that will be done, I have no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska will not prevail. I do not think the Committee on Agriculture has been parsimonious in making appropriations for the Department. I think in this bill the Bureau of Plant Industry has sufficient money appropriated to carry on the work asked for by the gentleman. To increase the amount provided by $50,000 is absolutely excessive. I want to say one thing to this committee. These appropriations have gone on for years for these scientific purposes. They will go on probably until we are all dead. The only thing for this committee and this House is to pass upon the question, How much money can these scientific bureaus expend judiciously within the fiscal year? It is not like an appropriation for a public building or any specific object. The committee have simply to decide how much can be judiciously expended within the fiscal year.

Mr. FINLEY. In what way is this money to be expended?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The appropriation for the Bureau of Plant Industry is to be expended in all the work provided for on pages 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, to 22. It covers all the work that can properly be done by that Bureau. The paragraph is drawn by the Agricultural Department, and covers every line of work they could suggest.

Mr. FINLEY. Do I understand the gentleman's remarks to include all the items of appropriation here, or to single out some of them?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The appropriation is to cover all of them.

Mr. FINLEY. Do I understand the gentleman's remarks to refer to all of the items, including the provision read?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is to be under the Bureau of Plant Industry.

Mr. FINLEY. Does the gentleman think that too much money is appropriated as a whole, or under any one of these items?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The work of the Bureau of Plant Industry is not divided. It is covered by one paragraph of the bill. If the gentleman will read the bill he can understand it a great deal better than I can explain it.

Mr. FINLEY. I have read it. I wanted to get at the purpose of the gentleman's remarks in order to see whether what he said referred to the total or to some of the items.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does not include the total to the Bureau of Plants. The total of the Bureau of Plant Industry with the free-seed amendment put in will have $242,000 added to the sum total of it, and this adds $76,000. I have just offered that as an amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. FINLEY. Of which one of these particular items does the gentleman complain?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object to the further raising of the committee amendment of $76,000 by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. POLLARD]. I think there is sufficient money to cover all the work that can be properly done within the fiscal year.

Mr. FINLEY. I only wished to understand the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. POLLARD. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee a question, if I may?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. POLLARD. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this $76,000 is simply intended to give the Bureau of Plant Industry the same amount of money they have heretofore had for the propagating of new varieties, and plant breeding, and work of that kind.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not put it that way, in view of the fact that the paragraph is drawn differently from last year's bill. The money appropriated for the Bureau of Plant Industry can be allotted for any work under that bureau that the Secretary of Agriculture may decide upon, and in amounts sufficient to meet all the demands.

Mr. POLLARD. Is this simply to make up the amounts that the committee took out?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; this is absolutely extra to the Bureau of Plant Industry, absolutely in excess of what the committee reported.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Does the gentleman from Nebraska understand that as a net result there is now added to the appropriation over last year $15,000 allowed by the committee, $4,000 allowed by the committee, and $72,000 allowed by the committee at this time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is right.

Mr. POLLARD. How do you get the $72,000 allowed by the committee at this time?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. By the committee amendment. It is over and above the totals of last year. There is added fifteen thousand and some odd dollars reported by the committee and incorporated in the bill. There is added now $4,000 for the matter covered by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and myself, which was omitted by an oversight. There is also added $72,000 through the committee amendment made by the chairman.

Mr. POLLARD. That has not been adopted yet.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. It is proposed to be adopted.

Mr. POLLARD. Is it offered?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is rather important to know whether we are adding or not adding this amount.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We are adding it.

Mr. MANN. I understood from the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROOKS] that this proposed $76,000 is a new item in the bill, so far as the amount is concerned.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That has never been carried in the bill before.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a clean addition to the amount originally recommended by the committee.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman this morning to say that this work was not paid for heretofore out of the Congressional distribution fund. My understanding was that it was so paid for.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I said that it was so paid for.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say it was not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, no; I said it was.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman contradicted me when I said it was.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. So that this item is in addition?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In addition.

Mr. MANN. For instance we have now an Agricultural Department expert in China, and the Department is to have another one in that part of China called Manchuria.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has one there.

Mr. MANN. Engaged in making selections of foreign plants or seeds for propagation here. Now, that can be of a great deal more service than anything else. I would rather cripple any other service of the Government than to cripple that, if I had my way about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the intention of the committee, by adding the $76,000.

Mr. MANN. It is so hard for us to believe that the Committee on Agriculture have voluntarily added $76,000 under the prodding they have received in the House to-day that it takes a little time for us to come to a full realization of the generosity of the committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, we farmers do not mind the little prodding we have had to-day; and we have had some satisfaction in watching the growth of the opposition to free seeds. A year or two ago the opposition could only count 5 votes. To-day it is 58.

Mr. MANN. I did not vote for free seeds. I think that part of it is a good deal of buncombe; but this is of real benefit to the country, the collection of new seeds. The distribution of foreign plants, fruits, and so forth, in this country is of more value, in my opinion, than anything that is provided for in any other one separate function of the Government. Every fruit we have almost is a foreign fruit. We ought to have experts in India and other places throughout the world gathering up new fruits.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are experts traveling in Italy, Germany, Holland, Guatemala, Cuba, Peru, Manchuria, and we have entomologists traveling in Germany and Austria. I think the Department can be trusted in this matter. I think the gentleman has omitted one thing also. The next paragraph in the bill provides $37,000 "for the collection, purchase, testing, propagating, and distribution of rare and uncommon seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries."

Mr. MANN. That is the item I would like to see increased, and I suppose a part of the $76,000 would be used for that purpose.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. It can be used for that purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The committee consulted with Doctor Galloway and he said he would prefer to have it under the general clause.

Mr. MANN. Where they can use it for this purpose if they wish to?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. POLLARD. Mr. Chairman, this matter seems to be somewhat confused. I understand the chairman of the committee to say that his amendment seeks to give the Bureau of Plant Industry the amount of money that they had last year for propagating the works of new varieties and breeding and the introduction of the varieties through the experiment station. It does not provide anything new to carry on the work which I have outlined before the committee, and for that reason I think my amendment ought to prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. POLLARD) there were—ayes 18, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that $242,000 be added to the total.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will offer that amendment at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the collection, purchase, testing, propagating, and distribution of rare and uncommon seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants from foreign countries or from our possessions for experiments with reference to their introduction into and cultivation in this country, $37,780; and the seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants thus collected, purchased, tested, and propagated shall be used for experimental tests, to be carried on with the cooperation of the agricultural experiment stations.

Total for Bureau of Plant Industry, $587,200.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk be authorized to correct the total, adding to it the $76,000 and the amount carried in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LAMB].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Correct the total so as to read $906,120.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For ascertaining the natural conditions upon and for utilizing the national forest reserves; and the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, permit timber and other forest products cut or removed from the forest reserves of the United States, except the Black Hills Forest Reserve in South Dakota, to be exported from the State, Territory, or the district of Alaska, in which said reserves are respectively situated; and hereafter sales of timber on forest reserves in the State of California shall in every respect conform to the law governing such sales in other States, as set forth in the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat. L., p. 661); and hereafter all moneys received as deposits to secure the purchase price on the sale of any products or the use of any land or resources of the forest reserves shall be covered into the Treasury in the manner provided by section 5 of the act of Congress approved February 1, 1905, entitled "An act providing for the transfer of forest reserves from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Agriculture," and the fund created by that act shall be available, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, to make refunds to depositors of money heretofore or hereafter deposited by them in excess of amounts actually due to the United States; and hereafter all moneys received as contributions toward cooperative work in forest investigations shall be covered into the Treasury and shall constitute a special fund, which is hereby appropriated and made available until expended, as the Secretary of Agriculture may direct, for the payment of the expenses of said investigations by the Forest Service and for refunds to the contributors of amounts heretofore or hereafter paid in by them in excess of their share of the cost of said investigations, for the employment of fiscal and other agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in practical forestry, in the administration of forest reserves, and in conducting experiments and investigations in the city of Washington and elsewhere; and he may dispose of photographic prints (including bromide enlargements), lantern slides, transparencies, blueprints, and forest maps at cost and 10 per cent additional, and other property or materials under his charge in the same manner as provided by law for other bureaus, the money received from such sales to be deposited in the Treasury; for collating, digesting, reporting, illustrating, and printing the results of such experiments and investigations; and for the purchase of all necessary supplies, apparatus, office fixtures, law books to an amount not exceeding $500; for freight, express, telegraph, and telephone charges, electric light and power, fuel, gas, ice, washing towels, and traveling and other necessary expenses, $887,140, of which sum not to exceed $35,000 may be used for rent. And the employees of the Forest Service outside of the city of Washington may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, without additional expense to the Government, be granted leaves of absence not to exceed fifteen days in any one year, which leaves may, in exceptional and meritorious cases where such an employee is ill, be extended, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, not to exceed fifteen days additional in any one year.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, line 17, after the word "situated," insert "Provided, That the exportation of dead and insect-infested timber only from said Black Hills Forest Reserve shall be allowed until such time as the forester shall certify that the ravages of the destructive insects in said reserve are practically checked, and in no case after July 1, 1908."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment at the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], who was unable to be here to-day, and I understand that it is satisfactory to the committee.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Laboratory, Department of Agriculture: General expenses, Bureau of Chemistry: Chemical apparatus, chemicals, laboratory fixtures and supplies, repairs to engine and apparatus, gas and electric current, purchase of all necessary office fixtures, supplies, and necessary expenses in conducting investigations in this Bureau, including actual and necessary traveling and other expenses, telegraph and telephone services, for express and freight charges, labor and expert work in such investigations, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; to continue the collaboration with other bureaus and divisions of the Department desiring chemical investigations and to collaborate with other Departments of the Government whose heads request the Secretary of Agriculture for such assistance, and for other miscellaneous work; for the employment of additional assistants and chemists, when necessary, and for the rent of buildings occupied by the Bureau of Chemistry; to investigate the adulteration, false labeling or branding, and laws, regulations, and decisions relative thereto, of foods, condiments, beverages, and drugs, when deemed by the Secretary of Agriculture advisable, and to publish the results of such investigations when thought advisable: Provided, That before any adverse publication is made notice shall be given to the owner or manufacturer of the articles in question, who shall have the right to be heard and to introduce testimony before the Secretary of Agriculture or his representative, either in person or by agent, concerning the suitability of such articles for food, or as to false labeling or branding. To investigate the effect of cold storage upon the healthfulness of foods; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of food preservatives, coloring matters, and other substances added to foods, to determine their relation to digestion and to health, and to establish the principles which should guide their use; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and to inspect before shipment, when desired by the shippers or owners of these food products, American food products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before said food products are allowed to be sold in the countries mentioned, and for all necessary expenses connected with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in foreign countries; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in collaboration with the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, and such other experts as he may deem necessary, to establish standards of purity for food products and to determine what are regarded as adulterations therein. To investigate, in collaboration with the Bureau of Animal Industry, the chemistry of dairy products and of adulterants used therein, and of the adulterated products; to determine the composition of process, renovated, or adulterated and other treated butters, and other chemical studies relating to dairy products, and to make all analyses of samples required for the execution of the law regulating the manufacture of process, renovated, or adulterated butters. To study, in collaboration with the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and agricultural experiment stations, the influence of environment upon the chemical composition of wheat and other cereals, with especial reference to the variation in the content of gluten, and the suitability of barley for brewing and other purposes. To investigate the chemical composition of sugar and starch producing plants in the United States and its possessions, and, in collaboration with the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and agricultural experiment stations, to study the effects of environment upon the chemical composition of sugar and starch producing plants. And the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he has reason to believe that any articles are being imported from foreign countries which are dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or which shall be falsely labeled or branded either as to their contents or as to the place of their manufacture or production, or which are kinds of products excluded from any foreign country for any cause whatever when coming from this country, shall make a request upon the Secretary of the Treasury for samples from original packages of such articles for inspection and analysis, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to open such original packages and deliver specimens to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose mentioned, giving notice to the owner or consignee of the sampling of such articles, who may, after notification, be present and have the right to introduce testimony before the Secretary of Agriculture or his representative, either in person or by agent, concerning the suitability of such articles for entry; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee of any such goods which the Secretary of Agriculture reports to him have been inspected and analyzed and found to be dangerous to health or falsely labeled or branded, either as to their contents or as to the place of their manufacture or production, or which are forbidden entry or to be sold, or are restricted in sale in the countries in which they are made or from which they are exported, or which are kinds of products excluded from any foreign country for any cause whatever when coming from this country. Employing such assistants, clerks, and other persons as the Secretary of Agriculture may consider necessary for the purpose named, $130,920: Provided, That no payment for storage, cartage, or damage incident to the inspection of food products which are found unsuitable for entry shall be made nor payment for similar expenses incident to the entry of other food products except accruing from an order of the Secretary of Agriculture, and then for no longer period than that terminated by notification by the Secretary of Agriculture that the articles are entitled to entry.

Total for Bureau of Chemistry, $158,500.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against that part of the paragraph after the word "adulteration," in line 12, on page 28, to and including the word "thereto," line 13, on the same page. The words embraced are "false labeling or branding, and laws, regulations, and decisions relative thereto." There is no law authorizing an appropriation for that service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, that is undoubtedly subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against other provisions in the paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a point of order to a further portion of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have the opportunity.

Mr. MANN. What was the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I made a point of order against lines 12 and 13, on page 28, and now I make the further point of order, on page 30, to all after the word "plants," line 10, of the entire remainder of the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. PERKINS. Before the gentleman yields I would like to know how much is covered by his second point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The point of order is to all that part of the paragraph after the word "plants," on page 30, line 10—the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. PERKINS. That would be down to and including line 22 on page 31.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; but I may conclude to limit the point of order to specific provisions.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I want to make certain points of order to this section, and I don't know whether the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] has made them or not. I do not desire to be held not to be in time with them, and I desire now to give notice that I am going to make certain points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The rights of the gentleman from Georgia will be preserved.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I want to understand also to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] makes his point of order.

Mr. LACEY. I want to inquire where the gentleman's point of order is.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I want to say on this proposition, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins his discussion I wish to make a further point of order to another portion of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's rights will be preserved.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to eliminate anything from this bill that seems to be proper matter in an agricultural appropriation bill, nor to take from the Secretary of Agriculture any power that he properly and reasonably ought to have. But all of the provision objected to I am satisfied is new legislation and subject to a point of order. It practically grants absolute control over the question of pure food as relates to imports from foreign countries, and the ethical question which was emphasized by the distinguished head of the Bureau of Chemistry in his testimony before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in relation to the labeling and branding and of weights and measures of commodities that are brought from foreign countries.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that this is the law already?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am aware that it is not the law in the manner that it is included here.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware that this provision was enacted into law last year, identically?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman ought to be made aware then that this has no place in an appropriation bill, because it is already the law. It does not purport to be a limitation.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will give me his attention for a moment, I desire to say that I have the agricultural bill for last year before me, and all of the paragraph that I have included in my point of order was not in the agricultural appropriation bill for last year. There is new matter interspersed all the way through the balance of the paragraph after the word "plants," on page 30, line 10. For instance, in line 15, page 30, after the word "production," there are the words "or which are kinds of products excluded from any foreign country for any cause whatever when coming from this country." That is new matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is right; that is new.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then, in line 23 the words "of the sampling" were not in last year's bill, and in the same line all after the word "notification" was not in last year's bill. Then, in line 24, after the word "testimony," there is language which is not in last year's bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, we do not modify the powers granted at all; we simply completed it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I am showing what was not in last year's bill—after the word "testimony," in line 24, the words "before the Secretary of Agriculture, or his representative, either in person or by agents, concerning the suitability of such articles for entry," were not in last year's bill. Then on line 9, page 31, after the word "exported," the words "or which are kinds of products excluded from any foreign country for any cause whatever, when coming from this country," were not in last year's bill. In addition to that none of the proviso was in last year's bill.

Mr. MANN. The proviso is subject to a point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, those little amendments do not alter the sense or purport of the clause in any particular. It simply perfects it and really gives the shipper more opportunity to defend his shipments.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I am inclined to modify my point of order so as to include the new provisions only. The new matter in lines 15, 16, and 17, on page 30, ought not to be in this bill or any other bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his points of order, does the Chair understand?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will make that statement in a moment. I am explaining the proposition. The new matter contained in lines 15, 16, and 17 on page 30 ought not to be in this bill or any other bill, and it is a most dangerous power to confer on any Department officer. What is the meaning of it? It means that whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that any articles are being imported from foreign countries which are dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or which shall be falsely labeled or branded, either as to their contents or as to the place of their manufacture or production, or which are kinds of products excluded from any foreign country for any cause whatever, when coming from this country, they shall be excluded. Now, I believe in the policy of retaliation. We already have a statute upon that subject, vesting in the President of the United States the power to exclude products coming from foreign countries which exclude similar products when sent there from this country, but here this provision excludes products coming from one foreign country when the same kind of products coming from this country are excluded from any country whatever. To illustrate——

Mr. MANN. Of course, if the gentleman will pardon me, if the gentleman's construction of that be right I think nobody would defend it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, isn't it right? Can it mean anything else?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the point of order, and a discussion of this kind is not relevant to the point of order which is now before the committee.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to make this statement——

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman has anything to say on the point of order, the Chair will be glad to hear it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, we are trying to arrange so that the point of order can be so reduced as not to include so much of the bill, and I will be ready in a couple of minutes to designate the particular parts of the paragraph I desire to go out on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, the object of that provision is this: Germany, for instance, or some other country excludes articles which we wish to send over there——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. For the reason that it is preserved in a certain way or put up in a certain way. Now, why should we permit German manufacturers, if it be Germany, to send over here the precise article which Germany excludes from here and put us to all that trouble? Now, the purpose is, of course, to limit that to the particular nation that does exclude us.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have no objection to that at all. As I said a moment ago, this provision excludes products from one country in all cases where similar products of this country are excluded, not from that country, but from any country, for any cause whatever.

Mr. LAMB. I suggest to the chairman to accept the proposition.

Mr. CRUMPACKER (continuing). Under the language of this provision, if articles come from France or England to this country, and Germany excludes similar articles coming from the United States, we are not permitted to let the French articles or English articles in.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think it bears that construction.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not think it bears any other construction. It may have been the intention to retaliate only against the country discriminating against us, but it does not say so. Under the provision, if Germany excludes articles shipped from this country we must deny admission of similar articles not only from Germany, but from any foreign country—England, France, Austria, Belgium, or any foreign country whatever. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to limit the point of order to the new language in lines 15, 16, and 17.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just read the section.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All after the word "production," in line 15, page 30, to and including the word "country," in line 17, page 30.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I concede it is subject to the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I understand the point of order is restricted only to the new matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, there are two other provisions——

Mr. MANN. That includes the proviso?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, it will. Strike out all after the word "export" in line 9, page 30, including the entire language of line 11 of the same page.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is subject to the point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And also the entire proviso on page 31.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is subject to the point of order. It is new legislation. I simply want to say, Mr. Chairman, in defense of the committee, that it was the only way in which we could build up this Bureau of Chemistry and render it efficient in preventing the introduction into this country of adulterated and falsely branded articles of food, in view of the fact that we had no general law on the subject. The object sought to be attained is excellent and for the preservation of health, and I am sorry the gentleman from Indiana raises the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know to what extent the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana went. I want to understand, but if it is necessary——

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the point which went out.

The Clerk again reported the portion stricken out.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order, if it has not been made, on line 11, page 28, "to investigate the adulteration, false labeling or branding, and laws, regulations, and decisions relative thereto, of foods, condiments, beverages, and drugs."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman will also state that has gone out. If the gentleman from Georgia will wait a moment the Clerk will again report the portions that have been stricken out.

The Clerk again reported the portions stricken out.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order on page 29 to the language "to establish standards of purity for food products and to determine what are regarded as adulterations therein." I make the point of order that there is no law——

The CHAIRMAN. What lines?

Mr. BARTLETT. Page 29, lines 14, 15, and 16; and the chairman of the committee, I apprehend, will admit that there is no law for that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You want to commence to strike out on line 11, and down to where?

Mr. BARTLETT. Down to "therein."

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is true there is no authority in law for that, except as it has been carried in the appropriation bill for at least five years.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to say that for four years this provision has been carried in the agricultural appropriation bill, but there is no other law for it. I make the point of order. It is a proposition of law which has been repeatedly ruled upon—that the fact that it is carried in an appropriation bill for that year does not make it permanent law, as has been time and time again decided by various Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole House. There is no law for this. Mr. Chairman, did I understand that the proviso in line 16, page 28, was also stricken out?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 31?

Mr. BARTLETT. Page 28.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that, commencing with the proviso on line 16 on page 28, down to and including the word "used," on line 2, page 29. I make the point of order against that and the other to which I have called the attention of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. We ought to have the matter clearly before us, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The point of order against the proviso on page 28, which reads: "Provided, That before any adverse publication is made notice shall be given to the owner or manufacturer of the articles in question, who shall have the right to be heard and to introduce testimony before the Secretary of Agriculture or his representative, either in person or by agent, concerning the suitability of such articles for food, or as to false labeling or branding. To investigate the effect of cold storage upon the healthfulness of foods; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of food preservatives, coloring matters, and other substances added to foods, to determine their relation to digestion and to health, and to establish the principles which should guide their use."

The CHAIRMAN. We will return first to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] on page 29, lines 14, 15, and 16.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course the point of order which the gentleman raises goes to all of the provisions.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. All of these provisions. It practically goes to the bill, so far as that is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order with reference to this question.

Mr. PARKER. With reference to the other point of order that was made, as to the proviso on page 28, I would suggest to the Chair that the proviso is a mere limitation and not new legislation. The old legislation in the last appropriation bill allowed the Bureau of Chemistry to investigate the adulteration of foods and to publish the results, and it is now proposed to provide that before any publication be made they shall give notice to the owner. This is a limitation, and it seems to me, therefore, not to be new legislation. I think it is a valuable provision anyhow. I do not understand why anyone should wish to strike it out.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I submit to the gentleman that the proviso helps the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I thought the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana reached more than the two lines. I make the point of order against the words commencing on line 11, page 28, to "investigate," ending with the word "advisable," in line 16, and including the proviso.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, on that point of order I desire to say that the law last year provided for just that investigation—to investigate the adulteration of foods, condiments, beverages, and drugs when deemed by the Secretary of Agriculture advisable, and to publish the result of such investigations when thought advisable. That is in the law of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether he considers that the law which he has now read is permanent law?

Mr. PARKER. It seems to me that when the bill says "Laboratory, Department of Agriculture, general expenses, Bureau of Chemistry," to do certain enumerated things, that this is an assignment to that Bureau of certain functions, and that you can not construe that law in any other way than as such an assignment.

The CHAIRMAN. Which is not necessary.

Mr. PARKER. But if it is a repetition——

Mr. MANN. Whether it is necessary is for the committee to say.

Mr. PARKER (continuing). It is merely discretionary to put it in, and if it is a repetition it does no harm. It is an assignment of a certain function. But if you leave this function out you do not appropriate the money for it. If you want them to do that work you must repeat the words, so as to say that they are to perform the same functions as they did last year. The object I have in rising is that while I have the same objection that the gentleman from Georgia and other gentlemen here have against giving discretion to these Departments and do not believe in their using——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not speaking to the point of order.

Mr. PARKER. I know that I am speaking only by unanimous consent. I only want to indicate the purport of what I meant to say hereafter. I am in favor, I am greatly in favor, of letting the people know what they eat and drink. I am going to move to insert the word "composition," so that the Bureau may investigate and publish the composition of foods and let the people know what they eat or drink, without having the Department say what they shall or shall not eat or drink. The real good will be attained by simply publishing the result of the investigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule.

Mr. MANN. The Chair may be prepared to rule. Will the Chair listen?

The CHAIRMAN. With much pleasure, if the gentleman desires to speak on the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I desire very likely to reserve the point of order on the whole paragraph after the Chair rules.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I inquire if the Chair knows fully the extent of my point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask whether a point of order has yet been made against page 29, beginning after the word "countries," contained in line 11, down to the word "therein," line 16.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That has all gone out.

Mr. PERKINS. That has been made and sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that if this language included in the lines upon which the point of order is made by the gentleman from Georgia is permanent law, as is claimed by the gentleman from New Jersey, then it should not be here. If it is not permanent law, then it seems to the Chair that it is new legislation and is clearly subject to the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Does the Chair hold that he can rule out something because it is really the law? Can we not reenact it? The committee has a right to a ruling of the Chair on the point of order; but it is for the judgment of the committee as to whether we reenact, as to whether that shall be in or not, with all due deference to the Chair. As to whether it is the law, or is contrary to law, that is a matter which we have a right to have the Chair determine.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair desires to find whether it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. PARKER. May I suggest to the Chair, very deferentially, that if you rule out the words on account of being permanent law, you rule out the appropriation for the purpose of carrying out the law, taking from the Department the money to carry it into effect. The money can not be used for that purpose unless the words are repeated.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems to the Chair that if it is permanent law, it is on the statute book now, and the appropriation carried in the bill would be expended under the law.

Mr. PARKER. The appropriation must be made for that specific purpose, or else it will not be expended for that. If you do not appropriate for the Department of Chemistry, the Department of Chemistry gets nothing; and if you do not appropriate for doing that particular work in the Department of Chemistry, that work can not be done.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I make a suggestion to the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. I insist that under the rule governing these provisions the fact that the appropriation was carried in the last appropriation bill does not make it permanent law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes that fact. The Chair is familiar with the proposition that the gentleman from Georgia has in mind.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] having suggested that being the well-established rule, it seems to me these provisions must necessarily be ruled out upon the point of order, because I do not see how it can be claimed on the other side that these provisions have ever been enacted into positive law. That disposes of the point made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I desire to make the point of order on the whole paragraph. There is no law for anything in here that I know of—or anything in the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do you mean the whole paragraph relating to the Bureau of Chemistry?

Mr. MANN. Yes; the laboratory.

Mr. PARKER. There is no authorization for the laboratory except on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MANN. I understand it is all in the same boat, Mr. Chairman. The bureaus in the Department of Agriculture have grown on appropriation bills. If it is the purpose to wind them up, why, let us wind them up now.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order on the whole paragraph of the laboratory.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Where is there any objection to the provision in the bill now, since the new matter has gone out on a point of order?

Mr. MANN. A lot of the old matter has gone out on a point of order. They have taken out of the bill now most of it that is any good.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have only to say this to the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois: The act under which the Department was organized provides in section 522 for one chemist, at a salary of $2,000; one assistant chemist, at a salary of $1,500; and certainly it implies the formation of a Bureau of Chemistry. What would these chemists have to do if you did not give them work to do?

Mr. PERKINS. They would do no harm, at any rate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then, another thing. Since the Chair has sustained the point of order, I think there is nothing left in the paragraph that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is nothing to which anybody can object at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. There is nothing that changes existing law, and therefore a point of order against what remains of the paragraph is certainly not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to hear from the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The provisions which the Chair has ruled out upon the point of order stand upon the same footing, as far as the law is concerned, as the balance of the provisions of this paragraph. The Chair rules out of order the provision—

To investigate the effect of cold storage upon the healthfulness of foods.

By the same token you should rule out the provision—

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries.

And the provision—

To investigate the chemistry of dairy products and of adulterants used therein, and of the adulterated products; to determine the composition of process, renovated, or adulterated and other treated butters.

They all stand on the same footing. While I do not agree with the Chair in its ruling (and this was not called to the attention of the Chair, and I do not know that it would modify the opinion of the Chair), I think this is a work in progress now. We have a great Bureau of Chemistry, with a large laboratory over here. To rule it out, of course, closes it up. It is a work in progress according to my notion. But it is all upon the same footing. There is no provision of law for any of it, unless it is already provided by law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is one provision——

Mr. MANN. There might be some one provision that is authorized by law, but that would have to go out with the rest of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The organic law provides for practical and scientific experiments, but it does not provide, so far as the Chair is able to ascertain, for any of the investigations referred to in the matter that has been ruled out.

Mr. MANN. But the Chair ruled out another thing——

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Does not the Chair regard that kind of an investigation as "practical and scientific?"

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. But the organic law provides (sec. 526):

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power.

The information must relate to agriculture.

Mr. ADAMS of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this very important work has been carried on for the last five years by the Government in the way of detecting adulterants designed for food and drinks brought here from foreign countries. That is done for two reasons: First, perhaps, to protect the people of the United States, the consumers, and also in the interest of American agriculture, to prevent dishonest competition with the products of the farm and the honest products of the factory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not question that. The Chair does not question the importance of the legislation, which the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture said that he felt was absolutely necessary to carry on the work that has already been undertaken by the Secretary of Agriculture, but which he admitted was subject to the point of order. Now, if general legislation is necessary it can be had; but the Chair is given no discretion in determining these points of order. The Chair must follow the rules of the House.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Chair, in the event that this point of order is sustained, what he would do with the portions of this paragraph which are undoubtedly inserted to give the Secretary of Agriculture power to carry out the law that does exist? For example, the provision with reference to oleomargarine, which is specifically referred to on page 29, in which it gives the Secretary the power to investigate the chemistry of dairy products by adulterants used therefor. In accordance with the execution of that law relating to that process there is this provision for carrying into effect the existing law, and if this entire paragraph is ruled out I hardly know what will become of that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman understand that any point of order has been raised against that provision?

Mr. SCOTT. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to raise a point of order against the whole paragraph.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to say to the gentleman that, as far as I was concerned, I carefully avoided making any point of order against that provision which he has just read.

Mr. SCOTT. That is true, but the gentleman from Illinois made a point of order against the entire paragraph, and if it is sustained, we are striking out a provision in accordance with existing law.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire if the Chair is considering the point of order raised by the gentleman from Illinois, the point of order on the whole section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair certainly is.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the point of order decided in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, which will be found on page 4847 of the RECORD, with reference to the Bureau of Chemistry, is certainly in point and certainly furnishes authority for the work covered by the paragraph. I think as to specific clauses, the portions objected to by the gentleman from Indiana, the point is good, but I think this decision ought to cover the objection to the section. There the provision was for investigations by the Department of Agriculture in the Bureau of Chemistry, the Bureau of Animal Industry, and the work of the Weather Bureau, and also investigation into the chemical composition of sugar-producing plants. The point of order was overruled by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS]. The point was made by Mr. CANNON, and it was overruled on the general authority of the organic act establishing the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. PARKER. Was it not on the ground that Congress could limit the general power to do certain specific acts?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. It was on the principle that the work was authorized by the organic act.

Mr. PARKER. The act only limited the appropriation to certain parts of the chemical work?

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I think so. I have the section of the RECORD here, if the Chair wishes to see it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before a final ruling is made I wish to call the attention of the Chair to another proposition, and that is as to whether this Chemical Bureau could be sustained on the ground that it is a continuation of an appropriation for an object already in progress. The Government several years ago, creating the Bureau of Chemistry and the Laboratory of Chemistry, entered upon a work as carried out by the appropriation bill certainly with some object in view. That object was a consideration of foods and other things in connection with drinks and foods from a chemical standpoint. It proceeded further, and entered upon the project of excluding from the country various adulterated and misbranded foods which were brought into the country. I supposed that that was an object in view. Whether it is an object in progress, under the meaning of the clause of the rule, I do not feel at all certain myself, but I submit the idea to the Chairman.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Chairman, I hope this decision will go over until to-morrow morning, but I want to have a single word on the law of this matter. I desire to submit that the organic law provides that the object of the Agricultural Department shall be "to acquire and diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture," and that, of course, includes foods, "in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word," and that law further provides that there shall be a chemist and assistant chemist in the Department. That law thus gives general power to make chemical investigations. That being so, Congress by the appropriation bill every year can limit the use to which the money shall be put by saying that it shall not be used on any sort of chemical investigation that the Department pleases, but shall be devoted to certain branches of that chemical investigation. That is a limitation. It is not a new law. It says, "You can make chemical investigations of this sort or chemical investigations of that sort out of that appropriation, but nothing else," and therefore I consider that in this particular clause all these provisions that say that the Bureau may investigate adulterations, or whatever it may be, are directing the purpose of the appropriation to something already authorized by law, and so limiting it to particular things and not giving it to general purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New Jersey tell the Chair what he read from?

Mr. PARKER. I read from Title XI, Department of Agriculture, in the Revised Statutes, page 87, first under section 520 and next under section 522. Section 520 states the object of the Department, namely, to acquire and diffuse information on subjects connected with agriculture, and section 522 provides that there should be a chemist and an assistant chemist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if the total ought not to be changed on page 31. The total is $158,500. Since these items have gone out of the bill, does not the gentleman think that that amount ought to be changed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They do not affect the total appropriated at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

Soil investigations: General expenses, Bureau of Soils: Investigation of the relation of soils to climate and organic life; for the investigation of the texture and composition of soils in the field laboratory; for the investigation of the cause and prevention of the rise of alkali in the soils of the irrigated districts; the investigation of the relation of soils to drainage and seepage waters, and of methods for the prevention of the accumulation of and injury from seepage waters in irrigated districts; for investigations of soils and for indicating upon maps or plats, by coloring or otherwise, the results of such investigations; to map the tobacco soils of the United States; to investigate the soils and conditions of tobacco growth in Cuba, Sumatra, and other tobacco-competing countries; to investigate, in cooperation with the Bureau of Plant Industry, the methods of curing, with particular reference to fermentation, to originate, through selection and breeding, improved varieties for the principal tobacco districts of the United States, and to secure, as far as may be, a change in the methods of supplying tobacco to foreign countries; the location of the stations; rent of buildings, not to exceed $4,000 per annum, for office and laboratory purposes; the employment of local and special agents, clerks, assistants, and other labor required in conducting experiments in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and in collating, digesting, reporting, and illustrating the results of such experiments; the preparation and printing of reports, drawings, and illustrations; for materials, tools, instruments, apparatus, gas, and electric current, furniture, supplies; for telegraph and telephone service, and for traveling expenses, freight and express charges, and other necessary expenses, $180,000.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 33, line 17, after the word "countries," as follows: "To investigate with a view of improving the conditions relating to the supply and sale of domestic tobacco to any foreign country or countries where the business of buying and selling tobacco is conducted by the Government."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, page 34, after "dollars," insert: "Provided, That $5,000 of the amount hereby appropriated shall be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in experimental work in raising tobacco in Onondaga County, State of New York."

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture approves of this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York the object of his amendment.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment and sincerely hope it may be allowed, in order that the tobacco growers of the State of New York, and especially of the county of Onondaga, may be given a little assistance and encouragement in the development of their industry by the Department of Agriculture through the Bureau of Soils; and in this we ask only the same treatment and benefits which have been given to other tobacco-producing districts in the country. Experiments in tobacco culture have been made in other tobacco districts, and we ask that the same kind of experimental work be done in our district. By the assistance of the Department of Agriculture in other localities the yield per acre has been increased, the quality improved, the price enhanced, and the acreage enlarged. And in order that our tobacco growers may be encouraged and stimulated in the same way this amendment is offered.

For a long time I have been trying to interest the Department and the Bureau of Soils in the tobacco districts of our State, and have made a little progress. Three years ago a soil survey was made of the tobacco district in Onondaga County, extending over into Cayuga County, in the district represented by Mr. PAYNE, and into Oswego County, in the district represented by Mr. KNAPP. Samples of soils were taken to Washington and analyzed, and other necessary data and information were accumulated. Later on a map and report were made and issued by the Bureau of Soils. Those were sent to tobacco growers in that district, and since that time they have been appealing to the Department to interest itself in experimental tobacco growing in that locality, in the same manner it has done in other States. They ask that a station be established there, and that men of experience from the Bureau of Soils be sent out among their tobacco growers to give them the benefits of their scientific knowledge and experience gained in similar work in other fields. In their behalf I have again and again applied to the Department and the Bureau of Soils every year since the survey was made for such aid, and my application has been denied, always on the ground that the appropriations were not large enough. I have been told on all occasions that an experiment station could not be established and properly conducted in New York without the withdrawal of a tobacco party from some other State in which the experiments have not been completed, for it requires more than one year to thoroughly do this work and educate the farmers so that they may continue on their own account. It takes several years for a tobacco party to complete experiments in the selection of seeds and their adaptation to the several soils, the selection of the best and most economical fertilizers and the amounts to be used, and in cutting, curing, fermenting, assorting, and otherwise handling the product to the best advantage, and in educating the farmers so that they may continue the work understandingly and advantageously.

The Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief of the Bureau of Soils have always expressed themselves as very anxious to take up the work in the New York district. They admit that it is very necessary and would be a great benefit to the tobacco growers, but they say that the appropriation for the Bureau of Soils will not permit it.

Now, these experiments have been made, and are being made, in other States and tobacco districts in Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Virginia, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, and Texas with excellent and profitable results. And we submit that New York should not be longer overlooked or neglected in this scheme of beneficial assistance, even if it requires an extra appropriation of $5,000, or if the Secretary of Agriculture be directed to spend $5,000 of this appropriation in experimental work in the tobacco districts of Onondaga County, N. Y.

The natural conditions in New York are very similar to those in Connecticut. The climate is about the same, the soils are very similar, and the varieties of tobacco grown in both States are very much alike. Both grow fillers, binders, and wrappers. Both produce cigar-making tobacco.

Some years ago the Bureau of Soils interested itself in the culture of tobacco in the Connecticut Valley. Experimental stations were established there. Tobacco experts were sent there. The plant was cultivated in the shade, and extensive and quite expensive experiments were made generally, and the farmers were given all the benefits, experience, and scientific knowledge possessed by the Bureau of Soils. As a result the tobacco interest has been improving and prospering in that State while it has been languishing and falling off in ours. The following statement, or table, speaks for itself:

Tobacco production in New York.

Investigation and experimental work have been conducted by the Bureau of Soils in Ohio. The different tobacco soils, and seeds adaptable to those soils, have been studied. Improved methods of cultivating and curing have been developed. Improved methods of planting, cultivating, handling, and fermenting the tobacco in bulk have been introduced. A higher grade of Cuban filler tobacco has been developed. The yield is increasing, and the quality of tobacco is improving. The Ohio district is now growing about 36,000,000 pounds annually of a better quality than heretofore. It brings a better price in the market, and this industry is prospering there.

In Texas and Alabama the Department is assisting the tobacco growers, and is introducing Cuban filler tobacco upon soils adapted to it and determined by their various soil surveys made in those States. There is a belt of land lying about 200 miles back from the Gulf coast, upon which the Cuban filler tobacco is nearly up to the grade of that grown in the island of Cuba. Under the benign assistance of the Department the tobacco interests in the State of Texas are extending and prospering. A fine grade of filler tobacco is being introduced and is being improved by those better methods of cultivation and selection. This is a new crop there, and is becoming not only profitable but is a substitute for cotton, which in some localities is seriously threatened by the boll-weevil.

In Virginia, too, the work of improving the tobacco leaf has been carried on for several years. The best grades of this product are being used in the United States for plug wrappers, and large quantities are being exported. Many and extensive experiments have been made in that State in different localities, and as a result the industry has been stimulated, the farmers have been encouraged, the quantity has been increased, and the quality improved.

Through the work of the Department of Agriculture and efforts of individual tobacco growers, the yield of the tobacco product in Florida has been greatly increased, and what was formerly a languishing industry is now thrifty and prosperous. Those experiments, and the experiments of the Department in other States, illustrate what may be accomplished by introducing new grades of tobacco, selecting proper and economical fertilizers, reforming the methods of cultivating, curing, and handling so that losses may be avoided, and introducing sound business methods in the management of this industry. Possibly some losses have been suffered by individual farmers in experimental work and in trying to follow new methods introduced or suggested by the Department. But the general results of these experiments by the Department in the various districts and States have been good, and have tended to increase the yield, improve the quality, reduce the expense, encourage and stimulate the tobacco growers, and in many instances to revive languishing industries. The Bureau of Soils, by reason of several years of experience in this experimental work, is now fully equipped to enter new fields, improve the varieties, and stimulate the tobacco business, without any material risk to the farmers in trying to follow their suggestions.

We ask that the tobacco growers in the State of New York be given the benefits of this experience and scientific knowledge. The tobacco industry in New York is not new. The plant was first grown in the town of Marcellus, Onondaga County, in the year 1845. It was found to be a success, and its cultivation continued to grow and spread throughout the county of Onondaga and adjoining districts and also into the county of Chemung. Seed leaf and Habana seed tobacco are grown in Onondaga. Both varieties are used in the manufacture of cigars, and both produce filler, binder, and wrapper grades. The light, silky, flexible tobacco leaf is produced on open-textured sandy soils and the heavier leaves are grown on close-textured loamy or clay soils. But the character of the leaf is determined not only by the soil, but by the methods of cultivation and the kinds and amounts of fertilizers, as well as by the methods of fermenting, curing, and handling.

The soil survey of the Onondaga district locates about 14,528 acres of Miami fine sand, a soil which in many of its characteristics is very much like the sandy soil in the Poquonock district in Connecticut. It locates about 19,968 acres of Miami fine sandy loam, 39,424 acres of Miami gravelly loam, and 41,536 acres of silt loam. These different varieties of soils produce different grades of tobacco. The light, sandy soils produce silky, high-grade wrappers and the solid, close-textured soils produce heavier grades of tobacco, which are used for fillers and binders.

The preliminary work has been done in the soil survey—map and report. The experts in the Agricultural Department, with their large experience in other places, can render great assistance to our farmers and tobacco growers in advice and suggestions, in recommending the proper grades of tobacco to fit the soil, and in educating them according to the most approved methods how to plant, cultivate, dry, and generally handle the product to the best possible advantage.

New York's agricultural interests may possibly be overlooked or overshadowed by the tremendous importance of its commercial, manufacturing, and financial achievements. Manhattan Island beats the world in location, formation for drainage, rock bottom for large buildings, climate, natural defenses, magnificent harbor and dockage, and all the natural advantages for a great commercial center. Greater New York is the metropolis of the western continent and its nervous center of commerce and finance, and is, in my judgment, beyond comparison the greatest city in the world. New York is a State of cities and large towns. Our ordinary municipalities suffer by comparison.

As an agricultural State, our relative position in the Union may not be recognized. Yet, according to the census of 1900, as an agricultural State New York heads the list in the value of its hay and forage, milk and cream, general dairy live stock, market-garden products, vegetables and apples, and is second in other products of the farm. Although it is the twenty-eighth on the list of States in area, it was fourth in the value of its farm products, and only eleventh in its tobacco industry. And while in other States and districts this industry has been growing and prospering since 1900, the tobacco industry in our State has been languishing and going backward. This should not be. Our farmers are sturdy, thrifty, and generally prosperous. In intelligence, industry, and even in scientific farming they are second to those of no other State in the Union. But our tobacco growers have not had a fair chance. They have been neglected and overlooked and permitted to shift for themselves, while the tobacco growers in other districts and other States have been helped in various ways by the Department. New York does not deserve this. The tobacco districts in New York, Onondaga and Chemung, do not deserve it. They are located in the Empire State. Onondaga is the geographical center. Our farmers do not ask many favors from the General Government. They have no arid lands to be irrigated, no swamps to be drained, no rivers and harbors to be improved. Our State is now building a barge canal throughout its whole length, from Lake Erie to the Hudson, at an estimated cost of $101,000,000, and the chances are that it will cost another hundred million before it is fully completed and in operation and the large liabilities are paid for riparian damages. And this great waterway, as a channel of commerce and transportation, will tend to keep down freight rates, which we are now trying to accomplish by legislation. It will inure to the benefit of the farmers throughout the great West by cheapening transportation, and it will injure our farmers by bringing the products of the fertile Mississippi Valley into their market. But of this they do not complain. New York, by reason of its diversified interests and its foremost position in the great activities which go to make up the prosperity of the nation, deserves well of the other States and of their Representatives in Congress.

This appeal of our tobacco growers, in order that they may have an even chance and a square deal with the people engaged in the same business in other States, should be recognized by the allowance of this little appropriation and the adoption of this amendment. It should be respected by the gentlemen who represent arid-land districts, which receive large benefits from the General Government. It should be recognized by you whose districts border on tide water and on large rivers, for the improvement of whose rivers and harbors large appropriations are being made from the Federal Treasury.

It should be recognized by the gentleman representing other tobacco-growing States and tobacco-growing districts, because it is only fair and just and reasonable. It should be recognized by you gentlemen whose cotton industry is being threatened by the boll weevil, and for the extermination of which a liberal appropriation is carried in this bill. It should be recognized by you gentlemen whose industries are being damaged by the gypsy moth and the cattle tick, and for the eradication of which appropriations are being made. I appeal to the inherent judgment and the spirit of fair play always manifested by members of this body; and especially I appeal to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, a New Yorker by birth, an agriculturist by occupation, an honored member of a great, distinguished, and patriotic family, and the progenitor of the brilliant and accomplished young speaker of the New York assembly, who, let me venture to say without disrespect to others, promises to eclipse the whole line of his distinguished forbears in well-doing and patriotic accomplishment. It is true that tobacco is not grown in his district, and in that regard he is not directly interested; but he is a gentleman of too broad and comprehensive vision to object on that ground. He is aware that the prosperity of one district tends to the prosperity of the whole Commonwealth, and the prosperity of one State tends to the prosperity of all the States. He is aware that our tobacco interests in New York have been going backward, languishing, and suffering. He is aware that our tobacco growers have not had a fair chance with the tobacco growers in other parts of the country. He is aware that they need such assistance as the Bureau of Soils and experienced experts can supply, in order that this industry may be revived, and he is also aware that this industry will continue to languish and suffer unless it is stimulated in this way. On all these grounds, and many others which may be advanced, I appeal to him to join with me in asking that this amendment be allowed in the interest of the tobacco growers of Onondaga.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. OLMSTED having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 13783. An act to provide souvenir medallions for the Zebulon Montgomery Pike Monument Association; and

H. R. 11796. An act for the diversion of water from the Sacramento River, in the State of California, for irrigation purposes.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina the work of Connecticut is almost finished and at some other points, and they can easily go now to New York State. No experiments have been made in New York State.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from New York if the gentleman from Kentucky is willing to do that I will make no objection.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Let me say in reply to the gentleman from New York that the work in Connecticut is not completed and is not likely to be in the next ten years.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That, Mr. Chairman, is a different understanding from what I have on the subject. I think Mr. Whitney, head of the Bureau, said before the committee that the work was almost completed.

Mr. HENRY of Connecticut. Doctor Galloway is doing the work.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, that is another appropriation; I thought the gentleman was mistaken. One is under the Bureau of Plant Industry and the other is under the Bureau of Soils.

Mr. LEVER. What I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, is this: I am perfectly willing for the gentleman from New York to have this; but if he is to have that I must insist on increasing the lump sum in this bill $5,000 in order that the work being done in other sections of the country may not suffer by reason of this. If the chairman of the committee is willing to do that I shall make no objection to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to add $5,000 to the sum total of this Bureau.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I hope this motion will not prevail. It is not necessary. We raised the appropriation of the Bureau of Soils $10,000 this year over last, and it is sufficient to carry on this work.

Mr. LEVER. In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I would say we are taking $5,000 of the $10,000 increase and giving it to the State of New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Suppose that is so, that does not materially alter the question, and I want to repeat what I said before to you—that this is a scientific investigation and this appropriation is only for the fiscal year.

Mr. LEVER. I have heard the gentleman from New York say that so many times——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from South Carolina yield for a moment?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If it is necessary that this Bureau should be increased $10,000 extra, why, it seems to me, we ought to add this additional $5,000, because it is being taken out for a specific purpose. Either they did need it or did not need it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This is not extra work; it is work on the line of the regular work by this Bureau. It is not new work entirely. It is directing the Bureau of Soils to conduct work in one section; that is all.

Mr. LEVER. We are up against just this kind of proposition: Either the increase of $10,000 allowed by the committee was needed or it was not needed. If it was not needed it ought not to be put in this bill. If it was needed, then the committee did right in putting it into the bill. If it was needed, then we are taking $5,000 away from it and giving it to the State of New York, and therefore we ought to put $5,000 more to the sum total of this appropriation. That is my proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. LEVER) there were—ayes 27, noes 21.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18537—the agricultural appropriation bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 15911. An act to amend the laws of the United States relating to the registration of trade-marks;

H. R. 17757. An act extending to the subport of Spokane, in the State of Washington, the privileges of the seventh section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement;

H. R. 11037. An act relating to the transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement; and

H. R. 11946. An act to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes."

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1565. An act for the relief of Theodore H. Bishop;

H. R. 1340. An act granting a pension to Robert Kennish;

H. R. 2796. An act granting a pension to Benjamin T. Odiorne;

CLAIMS OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PERKINS. The members of the California delegation are in receipt of a telegraphic dispatch from the governor of California in the form of a petition, which I present, and I ask that it may be read.

The telegraphic dispatch was read, and referred to the Committee on Claims, as follows:

OAKLAND, CAL., May 1, 1906.

HON. GEORGE C. PERKINS,
United States Senate:

Will Congress, in California's present great need, pass our 5 per cent public lands claim, amounting to about $1,000,000; also our war of rebellion claims, aggregating four million odd dollars; also our Indian war claims, originally six hundred and sixty thousand, on account of destruction of three hundred million San Francisco property, which represents one-fifth assessed valuation of entire State? Our State funds, including schools and maintenance of asylums, penitentiary, and repairs of public buildings injured and destroyed by earthquake will all be greatly hampered unless Congress can see its way clear to pass these claims, the justice of which has never been seriously questioned. Please bring the matter before Congress and explain our needs. We are under great obligations to Congress already, but we venture to ask for this further aid.

GEO. C. PARDEE, Governor.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented petitions of the Council of Jewish Women of Philadelphia, Pa., of the Council of Jewish Women of Syracuse, N. A bill (H. R. 17012) granting an increase of pension to Mary Thackara; and

A bill (H. R. 17004) granting an increase of pension to Willard F. Sessions.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 15768) granting an increase of pension to Mary J. Halbert;

A bill (H. R. 17684) granting an increase of pension to Joseph M. Hays;

A bill (H. R. 17591) granting an increase of pension to William Hall;

A bill (H. R. 17244) granting an increase of pension to James Crandol;

A bill (H. R. 17344) granting an increase of pension to John L. Fuhrman; and

A bill (H. R. 17055) granting an increase of pension to George Fankell.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 17638) granting an increase of pension to York A. Woodward;

A bill (H. R. 17613) granting an increase of pension to Susan E. Nash;

A bill (H. R. 17372) granting an increase of pension to Arethusa M. Pettit;

A bill (H. R. 17310) granting an increase of pension to Francis A. Hite;

A bill (H. R. 17143) granting an increase of pension to William Taylor;

A bill (H. R. 17067) granting an increase of pension to Simeon Pierce;

A bill (H. R. 17070) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Blakney; and

A bill (H. R. 17069) granting an increase of pension to William L. Wilcher.

Mr. OVERMAN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 17854) granting an increase of pension to John Eubank;

A bill (H. R. 17842) granting a pension to Josephine V. Sparks;

A bill (H. R. 17761) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Mackey;

A bill (H. R. 17644) granting an increase of pension to Henry C. Eastler;

A bill (H. R. 17619) granting an increase of pension to Davia D. Spain;

A bill (H. R. 17558) granting a pension to Lizzie H. Prout;

A bill (H. R. 17406) granting an increase of pension to William B. McAllister;

A bill (H. R. 17402) granting an increase of pension to Isaiah H. Hazlitt;

A bill (H. R. 17342) granting an increase of pension to Wesley G. Cox;

A bill (H. R. 17278) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Patterson;

A bill (H. R. 17231) granting an increase of pension to Rachel Allen; and

A bill (H. R. 17036) granting an increase of pension to Josephine L. Jordan.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7) to provide a seal for United States commissioners, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1751) to revive and amend an act to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property and the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States and acts amendatory thereof, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 17576) to provide for the entry of agricultural lands within forest reserves, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,500 for the salary of the consul-general at Dalny, Manchuria, and $5,000 for the salary of the consul-general at Boma, Kongo Free State, intended to be proposed to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and printed; which was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 17303) granting an increase of pension to William H. Hester; and

A bill (H. R. 17700) granting an increase of pension to Andrew T. Michell.

Mr. PILES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 17385) granting an increase of pension to James S. Ruby; and

A bill (H. R. 17120) granting a pension to Rhoda Munsil.

BRIDGES ACROSS CLINCH AND HOLSTON RIVERS.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5890) to authorize the South and Western Railway Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and the Holston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5891) to authorize the South and Western Railway Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and the Holston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the two bills just reported by the Senator from Arkansas from the Committee on Commerce. They are brief bridge bills and uncontested. I should be glad to have them considered now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first bill reported by the Senator from Arkansas will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 5890) to authorize the South and Western Railroad Company to construct bridges across Clinch River and the Holston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask a question, which just occurs to me from hearing the bill read. The word "bridge" is in the plural, and there is no place designated where it shall be built. I know that we have passed a general bridge bill, but is it not usual to put in the place where the bridge is to be located? The bill provides that it may be built anywhere on the river.

Mr. MARTIN. There is a very short distance in which these bridges will have to be built, and under the general act of Congress, to which this bill is made subject, the Secretary of War will control the matter. This bill has been to the War Department, and it has been approved by the Chief of Engineers.

Mr. FRYE. I might call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the fact that we have passed a general law during the present session of Congress touching the construction of bridges. This bill shows conclusively how much benefit may be derived from that act. Ordinarily this bill would have covered four or five or six pages. Now it comprises only one page, because every requirement is contained in the general law, to which this bill refers.

Mr. BURKETT. I will say in reply to the Senator from Maine that I remember the general act, and, of course, I understand that it has obviated the necessity of having a long bill passed; but I asked the question because this bill is in the plural, giving the company the right to build bridges across the river, and it does not specify where the bridge is to be located or anything about it. But if, from the circumstances, there is necessarily only a short distance, as the Senator says, where they can locate the bridge, that covers all I wished to inquire into.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The second bill reported by the Senator from Arkansas will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 5891) to authorize the South and Western Railroad Company to construct bridges across the Clinch River and the Holston River, in the States of Virginia and Tennessee; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DAMS AND POWER STATION ON COOSA RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. FRYE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15334) to authorize the construction of dams and power stations on the Coosa River at Lock 2, Alabama, to report it favorably without amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of this local bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what the bill is before it is passed.

Mr. FRYE. It simply gives authority to build a dam or dams across a river which, so far as navigation is concerned, has been abandoned by the Government.

Mr. TELLER. Is it a navigable river?

Mr. FRYE. It is not at the point where the dam is to be erected, and the Government has abandoned all idea of making it so.

Mr. TELLER. If that is the case, I understand that the Government of the United States has nothing to do with the river. The Government of the United States has no control over a river beyond the navigable point.

Mr. FRYE. But of course the Coosa River is a navigable river, and only at this point it is not proposed to make any appropriation to secure navigation farther up the river. Of course the Government retains the right whenever it pleases to reconsider its action and make it a navigable river, and this bill makes provision for that event.

Mr. TELLER. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I want to put myself on record against the control by the General Government of any nonnavigable waters within a State. Nonnavigable waters belong to the State and not to the General Government. Whenever a river ceases to be navigable the jurisdiction of the General Government ceases over it.

My only objection to the bill is as a precedent; but of course if it will benefit somebody I do not care about interfering with a matter which concerns the people in another section of the country from mine.

Mr. BACON. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine who is the author of the bill?

Mr. FRYE. It came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. BACON. I have some familiarity with the Coosa River. It is a river which is navigable the entire length in sections. There are shoals which interrupt the navigation at different points. It is not a river in the class of which the Senator from Colorado speaks. It is a river navigable all the way up to Rome, in Georgia. While it lies mainly in Alabama, it is navigable to Rome, and above that point on the tributary rivers which form the Coosa.

I have been over the particular sections to which the bill relates. I was not fortunate in hearing the reading of the bill, but I understand that it simply proposes that the water power may be utilized, and I am quite sure that the water can be utilized without in any manner interfering with the navigation of the river when the Government shall proceed hereafter to construct dams and docks at the shoals which will make the navigation uninterrupted.

Mr. FRYE. All those rights are reserved to the Government in the bill.

Mr. BACON. I thought I would take the liberty of making this statement. It is a fine river, and a river which is navigable throughout its entire length, with interruptions at shoals which confine the navigation to sections, and the navigation is in sections rather than a continuous navigation. But it may be made continuous and become a valuable artery of commerce whenever the Government shall proceed to construct locks and dams upon the other shoals as it has already done upon three or four of the shoals, and they are very important works there.

Mr. FRYE. Yes; we have expended a good deal of money on the river.

Mr. BACON. And it is very fine work. I have been over it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO GEN. HORACE PORTER.

Mr. LODGE. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 149) extending the thanks of Congress to Gen. Horace Porter, to report it favorably without amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TALIAFERRO introduced a bill (S. 5986) for the establishment of a fish-culture station in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5987) for the relief of the heirs of J. L. F. Cottrell, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5988) granting an increase of pension to L. N. Lafontisee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 5989) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River in Broadwater and Gallatin counties, Mont.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 5990) granting a pension to Jacob Peter; which was read twice by its tile, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 5991) granting an increase of pension to George F. Ford; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5992) granting an increase of pension to Franklin Craig; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 5993) granting a pension to Mary M. Marpe; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5994) granting an increase of pension to John Dickey; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5995) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Joseph Gardner; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (S. 5996) to remove the restrictions on the alienation of land in the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, and Seminole nations, Indian Territory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 5997) granting an increase of pension to William Miser;

A bill (S. 5998) granting an increase of pension to William A. McGaha; and

A bill (S. 5999) granting an increase of pension to Cyrus M. Miller.

Mr. DRYDEN introduced a bill (S. 6000) granting an increase of pension to James H. Baum; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. OVERMAN introduced a bill (S. 6001) granting an increase of pension to Emily Killian; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6002) for the relief of Peter F. Pescud, jr., John S. Pescud, Sue B. Craig, and Mollie I. Pescud, heirs at law of Peter F. Pescud, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 6003) to construct and place a steel light-ship on "Forty Fathom Bank," so called, off the entrance to the Straits of Juan de Fuca; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FORAKER introduced a bill (S. 6004) to provide an American register for the steam yacht Waturus; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO RAILROAD RATE BILL.

Mr. MARTIN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. BACON submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the rate bill—House bill 12987. It was prepared by the Interstate Commerce Commission at my request, following some correspondence in regard to the sixth section of the act, which seemed to me to be somewhat confused, and more or less conflicting with other parts of the bill.

I ask that the correspondence between the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and myself be printed, and that the memorandum which they sent along with the amendment be also printed. My request is that all the papers as I send them to the desk be printed for the use of the Senate, and then that the amendment be printed separately.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for widening and grading Minnesota avenue from Pennsylvania avenue northward as far as the land may have been dedicated therefor, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment relative to the pay of letter carriers and clerks in charge of substations of rural delivery service, intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to fix the salaries of six justices of the peace of the District of Columbia at $3,000 each per annum, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—WILSON W. BROWN AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. FORAKER, it was Ordered, That there may be withdrawn from the files of the Senate all papers relating to the bills (S. 4349, 55th Cong.; S. 873, 56th Cong.; S. 2028, 57th Cong., and S. 3294, 58th Cong.) granting an increase of pension to Wilson W. Brown and others, there having been no adverse report on any of said bills.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. KEAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the hearings and bills printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

CONFERENCES AND CONFERENCE REPORTS.

Mr. CLAPP. I am advised that there remain very few copies of Senate Report No. 1545, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session, being the report of the Committee on Appropriations in response to a resolution of the Senate directing it to have prepared a manual of the law and practices in regard to conferences and conference reports. I move that the document be reprinted.

The motion was agreed to.

AID IN REBUILDING SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I introduce a concurrent resolution, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to make a few remarks regarding it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read at length, if it is to be discussed.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas two-thirds of the city of San Francisco has been destroyed by fire following an earthquake, such destruction including the entire banking, commercial, wholesale, and manufacturing section, as well as over one-half of the residential section; and

Whereas over 200,000 people are now homeless; and

Whereas San Francisco has been and is the leading port of the Pacific coast intimately related with every part of the United States in the transaction of interstate commerce and with oriental and other foreign countries in the conduct of foreign commerce; and

Whereas it is of the highest importance not only to the Pacific coast and intermountain region, but to the entire United States that the city should be immediately restored with a view to the promotion of interstate and foreign commerce, and the cooperation of the nation is of the highest importance in such restoration; and

Whereas, though the courage shown by the people of San Francisco in this emergency will doubtless prove equal to the restoration of the city through individual enterprise, it is probable that such restoration will be slow and it is proper and wise that the nation should consider its own vast interest in the speedy completion of such work upon lines which will make for the highest commercial and industrial development of the country; and

Whereas it has been suggested that the nation under its powers relating to the general welfare and the regulation of commerce between the States and with foreign countries should come to the aid of San Francisco either by a direct loan or by a guaranty of credit or by cooperation with the entire American people in a broad financial project which shall involve the restoration of San Francisco upon comprehensive and enduring plans: Now, therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Finance of the Senate consider jointly the various plans for financial aid in the restoration of San Francisco, and that they report to the Congress whether or not it is advisable or practicable for the National Government to aid in the restoration of San Francisco, either by a guaranty of credit to the city of San Francisco which will enable the city to secure at low rates of interest the money necessary for public works, as well as the money necessary for the restoration of the commercial, residential, and manufacturing buildings of San Francisco, to be loaned at fair rates of interest by the city to property owners upon note and mortgage, such guaranty of credit to be conditioned upon the approval by a commission, to be appointed by the President of the United States, of the plans proposed and the expenditures made thereunder; or whether it is practicable or advisable to promote the organization of a great financial corporation, national or State, half of whose stock shall be taken by subscribers for cash and half of which stock may be taken by San Francisco property owners for property conveyed to such corporation, at an appraised valuation, the cash subscribed to be used either for loans to individual owners of San Francisco property or to be expended in improving property so conveyed to such corporation, with provisions for the gradual sale of such property after the successful completion of the work of restoration; such plan to involve profit to the stockholders thus cooperating; and whether or not it is practicable or advisable for the United States to invest in the stock of such corporation or to make a loan to such corporation upon the lines heretofore pursued by the National Government in aid of national expositions for the promotion of commerce between the States and with foreign nations, or whether any other plan is advisable or practicable for national aid in the restoration of San Francisco.

"That whatever plan of aid be advised, a board of national commissioners experienced in exposition building, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be included, with such powers of control over both plans and expenditures as may be deemed advisable."

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that a newspaper clipping which I send to the desk be read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ONE HUNDRED MILLION DOLLARS BY NEW YORK TO REBUILD SAN FRANCISCO—UNITED STATES SENATOR NEWLANDS, OF NEVADA, SAYS HUGE SUM HAS BEEN PRACTICALLY AGREED ON BY FINANCIERS—BANKS RESUME IN EARTHQUAKE CITY.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 1, 1906.

One hundred million dollars is to be subscribed by New York capitalists toward making a city beautiful by the Golden Gate if a plan outlined by United States Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, in a telegram received by W. F. Herrin, chief counsel of the Southern Pacific Railroad, here to-day proves feasible.

Senator NEWLANDS in his message announces that New York financial houses have virtually consented to supply the money on a bond and mortgage basis, and while the names of the houses subscribing to the fund are not yet made public the news was greeted here by business men with the greatest pleasure.

The local finance committee, headed by James D. Phelan, is discussing the terms of the offer, and it is deemed that should they prove capable of acceptance such an impetus will be given to construction that the new city's practical completion will thus be advanced in wonderful measure.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I was quite surprised this morning to find this announcement in the New York Herald and in other newspapers. It has doubtless been given wide currency. It was not my intention to say anything in public upon this subject, but I think now that a public statement should be made by me in explanation of this article.

For the last two or three days I have been in New York City and have been in conference with leading financial men there with reference to a project for the restoration of San Francisco. I deemed it of the highest importance that the two great railroad systems, the Santa Fe and the Southern Pacific system, controlling nearly 30,000 miles of railroad, with all the banks and financial men back of them, should aid in such a project. I therefore telegraphed to William F. Herrin, the chief counsel of the Southern Pacific system at San Francisco, a man of great breadth of view and energy of character, outlining a plan or project, and asking him to consult with others, particularly with Mr. Harriman, and to advise me as to whether or not they thought the project practicable or advisable. I had no idea that any communication of this would be given to the press. I assume that in some unauthorized way it has got to the information of the press, and, of course, under those conditions such statements are usually incorrect or exaggerated. The plan has not reached such proportions as is suggested in the telegram. I have had no definite assurance from any of the financiers in New York as to whether they would be willing to enter upon such a project. I found, however, that there was in New York, as there is throughout the whole country, great sympathy with San Francisco and great disposition to aid her in any practicable way. So, Mr. President, when I saw this article this morning, I concluded to draw up the resolutions in an alternative form, which would present to Congress the suggestions for national aid and cooperation which may be essential to the speedy restoration of San Francisco.

Let me say, by way of preliminary, that though I have been a heavy loser in that fire, and those associated with me have been very heavy losers, a very large proportion of their income being lost, we do not propose to be the beneficiaries of any plan here suggested. We propose ourselves to finance the reconstruction of the hotel and other buildings which have been destroyed in San Francisco, and in which we are interested, and to move with the utmost energy and faith in the outcome. I say this lest interested motives might be attributed to me. I am not personally interested in these suggestions, except as one having an interest in that city and in the coast, and having a warm affection and regard for the city of San Francisco and its people.

I wish to add that I have offered these resolution without consulting either of the Senators from California. I know the great pride and self-reliance of the people of that State, and I know how reluctant either one of those Senators would be to present a matter here which might appear to be an appeal for help and an abandonment of the self-reliance which California has always shown.

RESTORATION OF SAN FRANCISCO A NATIONAL MATTER.

I believe that the restoration of San Francisco is a national matter, in which the people of all sections should participate through subscriptions to a private financial project, if that be practicable, or through national aid if practicable, or both combined, and I see no constitutional or practical difficulties in the way.

San Francisco has about 450,000 people. Of those 450,000 people nearly 300,000 are to-day homeless. Two-thirds of the city has been destroyed by fire; all of the financial, the commercial, the manufacturing, and wholesale districts of the city have been destroyed. Whilst the insurance is considerable, it is in process of adjustment and it may take a long time for adjustment. San Francisco is the great port of the Pacific Ocean, through which a large portion of the interstate commerce and through which a large portion of the foreign commerce of the nation is conducted. That city not only has relations with the entire Pacific coast and entire intermountain region, but it is the gateway through which the entire nation conducts its commerce with the Orient and many foreign nations. As a matter, therefore, of the regulation of interstate commerce and of commerce with foreign nations, as a matter affecting the general welfare of the United States, it is obvious that the nation itself is interested in the immediate restoration of San Francisco.

OUTSIDE AID WILL FACILITATE RESTORATION.

Restoration without outside aid can be accomplished, but it will be slow and accidental. In many cases the money received from insurance will only be sufficient to pay the mortgage upon the property; in many cases the money received from insurance, even though the property be clear, will be entirely inadequate to restore the buildings. The loans of that city and of the entire State are made through great popular savings banks with vast accumulations. Obviously those banks keep little money on hand; they loan it out upon note and mortgage, and they pay fixed rates of interest to their depositors. As, therefore, these moneys are already loaned ont, and there are no large accumulations in many of the savings banks, it is clear that the financial institutions there can not give the aid that is necessary for the restoration of that city. Nor can we trust simply to individual action. Individual action is necessarily accidental in its results. The restoration of San Francisco must be upon broad and comprehensive lines, involving a greater strength and beauty in the development of the city in the future than has been displayed in the past. The development of that city requires a central control—a central control of the plans and a central control of the finances, such control as has been exhibited in the great expositions of the country, the World's Fair at Chicago, the great exposition at St. Louis, and the exposition at Buffalo, where, through the aid of the nation and through the aid of the various States, great white cities have sprung up almost in a nighttime, with a perfection of plan and a beauty of detail unequaled in the history of the world. If we trust to individual effort, if each man in San Francisco who owns a lot seeks to put up some kind of a structure upon it, we will, of course, have an accidental growth, a dangerous growth, so far as fire is concerned.

Here let me say that as to fire and earthquake in San Francisco, the earthquake itself did very little in the way of the destruction of San Francisco; indeed, almost nothing. The destruction came from fire. That can be guarded against in the future, for San Francisco is almost entirely surrounded by water—the water of the ocean on one side and the water of the bay on the other, and doubtless in the comprehensive plan for the future provision will be made for getting sea water from the ocean and from the bay that will meet the emergency of any possible conflagration.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada if he has any information as to how the modern structures built of steel stood the shock of earthquake? I have seen various conflicting statements upon that subject, and it is an extremely interesting and important fact to know.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have received both telegrams and letters upon that subject, and the universal testimony is that the steel structures stood the earthquake admirably. In some cases a little of the filling was shaken out, but the structures remained and are capable of being put in order for occupation.

USE OF CONCRETE ADVOCATED.

In that connection, I will state that I think that the buildings in San Francisco will in the future be largely constructed of reenforced concrete. Concrete itself being composed largely of cement which has been subjected to an immense fire test, resists the flames, and it also has a cohesiveness that almost nothing else has. Reenforced by steel under the modern system of construction, it presents an admirable and cheap material for building. California has an abundance of the best natural deposits for the making of Portland cement. It has also stone, sand, and gravel in abundance which can be utilized. Yesterday I visited Atlantic City for the purpose of inspecting a hotel that had recently been constructed, a part of it twelve stories high. It was composed entirely of reenforced concrete, and it is clear that that style of construction will be the most useful in San Francisco. I was told that such hotel construction costs only 22 cents per cubic foot, whilst the ordinary hotel construction costs from 40 cents to a dollar a cubic foot.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to know if the Senator from Nevada has made any calculation as to the number of millions of dollars that would be required from the Treasury of the United States to carry out the scheme that is embodied in his resolution?

$300,000,000 NEEDED TO RECONSTRUCT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I have my view regarding that, but it is not based upon any accurate computation, and I should prefer not to state it now. The resolutions which I have introduced make it a matter of inquiry by the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Ways and Means of the other House. I have no doubt that competent people will appear before that committee and give testimony upon that subject. I will abandon my caution, however, and say to the Senator that I think the entire restoration of San Francisco will cost about $250,000,000 or $300,000,000.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator will remember that a few years ago there was a crop failure all through the Middle West——

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator allow me to state right there, however, that of course it is not expected the National Government shall give relief to that extent. There will probably be one hundred or one hundred and fifty million dollars in insurance that can be applied to the work of restoration, and then, doubtless, private enterprises will take hold of another large part.

Mr. HOPKINS. So that $100,000,000 from the Government Treasury would restore San Francisco, with the money that you would get from other sources?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should think so.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to ask the Senator, Mr. President, how his scheme differs from the project that was suggested a few years ago of aiding the farmers when their crops failed, and it was proposed that the Government should loan them money at 2 per cent and take mortgages on the crops that were to be raised in the future?

CAN NOT THE GOVERNMENT AID CALIFORNIA AS IT HAS AIDED CUBA AND THE PHILIPPINES?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Well, Mr. President, I am not very familiar with the plan that was proposed at that time, and I would rather speak of aid that has been given rather than aid that has been simply contemplated. But I will state to the Senator that a country that could spend $200,000,000 in the cause of humanity for the purpose of freeing Cuba, that a country that can spend $300,000,000 for the purpose of instructing the Filipino people in the science of self-government, can certainly afford to lend its credit simply to the extent of $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 for the restoration of a great port, essential to the conduct of interstate and of foreign commerce and essential to the general welfare of the country, and whose energies are now paralyzed by almost unprecedented calamity.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. I understand, Mr. President, that the Senator sees no constitutional objection to either the project of advancing $100,000,000 to the people of San Francisco for the purpose of their carrying on their private interests, or of advancing $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 to the farmers of the country whenever there is a drought or a lack of the annual production of the various farm products.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will not enter into the question of the loan to the farmers. I speak only of cases where the Government itself has given aid. It will be recalled that when Galveston was destroyed the Government gave aid—I do not know to what extent—but if it gave aid to a small extent it could give aid to a large extent. The extent of aid depends upon how far the national interests are involved and the necessity for it. So also with reference to national expositions. Under what power do we give aid to these national expositions? Under that delegated power regarding the regulation of commerce between the States and with foreign nations, and if we were willing to give $10,000,000 to the St. Louis Exposition for recreation and business, can we not undertake to give at least that amount, or our credit to that amount or a larger amount, for positive work that will be of advantage to the entire country?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator approves of the Government of the United States loaning John Jones or Bill Smith, of San Francisco, $100,000 to reconstruct a hotel there, why on the same principle should not the Government advance money to an insurance company that will be broken if it is required to pay the money on the property that it insures in the city of San Francisco, so as to keep it and its stockholders from any loss?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I can not permit myself to be drawn into side issues. The resolutions that I have drawn commit the United States to nothing except an inquiry, and that inquiry is as to whether it is constitutional or advisable or practicable to aid in the restoration of San Francisco in any way. That is all. I do not propose now to commit myself to any theory. It may be when the exposition of this whole matter is presented to us by the committee that I may not be in favor either of a direct loan to San Francisco or of aid in the shape of credit. It may be that that committee may conclude it is not wise to do anything; and possibly I may support that committee in its conclusion. All that I wish to do now is to have the nation consider this matter, first, as to whether it has the power; and, second, whether it has the disposition and the willingness to aid in some way in the restoration.

Our aid may simply take the form of public works there—in the construction of public buildings. It may take simply the form of harbor improvements intended for the benefit of foreign commerce. So I do not propose here to allow myself to be dragged into a seeming antagonism with the Senator from Illinois when no antagonism exists. I have as open a mind as he has upon the subject; but I do beg leave to present some considerations tending to show that this fearful calamity is not simply of local importance, but that it is a matter of national importance; that it affects the greatest port upon the Pacific coast; that it intimately affects interstate commerce and foreign commerce and the prosperity and welfare of the entire people of the United States; and the American people are not what I think them to be if they will not, either through private effort or governmental effort, or both combined, work for the immediate and speedy restoration of San Francisco.

If San Francisco is to be restored, it is important that it should be immediately restored. If it is to be restored, it can be restored as well in a year as it can be in five years, and with infinitely more advantage to the entire country. If by a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together we can restore San Francisco to its former greatness and glory, I ask whether it will not be an act of which every American will be proud?

THE GOVERNMENT MIGHT GUARANTEE SAN FRANCISCO BONDS.

Mr. President, what form is it suggested that direct aid to San Francisco should take? Not the form of an individual loan by the Government of the United States to the property owners of that city for the purpose of enabling them to rebuild their houses. That is not the form. The form suggested is that the United States should simply guarantee the bonds of the city of San Francisco to the extent of one or two hundred million dollars, in order that she may float the loan at a low rate of interest, the money to be turned over to San Francisco, though subject, of course, to some national supervision and control as to expenditure by reason of the national guaranty, and then, after the——

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. NEWLANDS. If the Senator will hear me through and allow me to complete my sentence first. And after this money is received by San Francisco, that city can expend a certain portion of it in public works and can, if she chooses and is so authorized by the State, loan out that money for reconstruction of buildings upon note and mortgage at 4 or 4½ per cent, providing for repayments in annual sums, and thus gradually the bonds will be retired. The loans to the individuals are to be made by the city of San Francisco. The United States is simply to guarantee the bond issue, for which there is ample security, as to-day San Francisco is absolutely free from debt.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, the Senator is recognized as a good lawyer, and I should like to ask him to make the distinction between a direct loan by the Government to an individual of San Francisco and a guarantee of a loan made by the city of San Francisco to the individual. Is there any difference in principle?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Government is not to have anything to do with the individual. Its guaranty is to extend to the city's credit only. But I will not pretend to enter into that question. If ever such a plan is presented, I will come to a conclusion, after study, as to whether I can sustain it or not. I am now simply stating what is suggested. This is one of the things that is suggested that I should like to have go before the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House for their consideration, and if they conclude that we have not the power to do it or that it is inadvisable to do it, that would probably end the matter.

That is the suggestion, so far as direct aid is concerned. It is said San Francisco itself could secure this loan. Well, it could under ordinary conditions, but you can not tell how much and how far the fear of earthquakes may affect the investing public. Certainly if San Francisco should put a large sum upon the market the rate of interest exacted would be a large one, and if the Congress of the United States can, in the exercise of its constitutional power, save the city of San Francisco that sum in the shape of interest, which, if paid into a sinking fund, would in the space of thirty years absolutely retire the debt, I ask whether it can not consistently be asked to exercise that power?

STATE AND NATIONAL GOVERNMENTS SHOULD COOPERATE.

Here we have a dual sovereignty in this country—the sovereignty of the State and the sovereignty of the nation. I see no reason why when either sovereignty is in danger the other sovereignty should not rush to the rescue, within, of course, its constitutional powers. It is this mutual spirit of cooperation between the States and the National Government that will give us the prosperity which we seek. We are all bound together by the ties of amity and interest, and when interstate or foreign commerce is impeded by the paralysis of a port in a particular State the concern is national and is not confined to a particular State or to the port itself.

THE GOVERNMENT MIGHT GIVE AID TO A CORPORATION FOR THE RECONSTRUCTION OF THE CITY AS IN THE CASE OF EXPOSITION CORPORATIONS.

Now, what is the other suggestion? The other suggestion is simply one of a private financial corporation with a capital of, say, $100,000,000 represented by stock. That corporation could be organized either under national or State law. Fifty million dollars of that stock could be taken partially by the great financial interests of the country, particularly the interests that are backing the great transcontinental railroads which are directly interested in this matter. I have no doubt also that a popular subscription would be responded to most liberally, for this project would have in view not simply humanity, not simply patriotism, but profit, and it would prove an exceedingly profitable venture.

The nature of the venture would be this, that one-half of the capital could be subscribed in cash and the other half could be taken by the people of San Francisco, who lack capital for rebuilding, in exchange for real estate at appraised values. Such a corporation then would have the land to improve and it would have the money with which to improve it, and the corporation could be so organized as to provide after the restoration for the gradual sale of the properties, so as to prevent monopoly in land holding. Such a corporation could also make loans on note and mortgage to people who wished to improve on their own account, but it would exercise a wise control as to character and strength of the structures and their adaptability to existing requirements. We would thus have the benefit of a strong financial corporation, something like the great exposition corporations, with large capital, acting through intelligent and capable men, treating this entire problem as a whole instead of in the disjointed manner in which individuals will necessarily treat it.

To such a corporation would it not be entirely proper for the United States to make a subscription or a loan? Have we not done it repeatedly in the case of all the expositions? In some cases we have made gifts ranging as high as millions of dollars, and in other cases we have made loans. We helped the St. Louis exposition to the extent of $10,000,000. Under what power? Simply under the power as to interstate and foreign commerce and under the powers relating to the general welfare of the United States; and it seems to me it would be entirely wise and proper for the United States, when this project is taken up by the great financiers of the country and properly backed and presented, with able and honest and capable management, to aid such a corporation either by a direct loan or by a subscription to its stock.

Such a corporation would doubtless make large profits. We have the history of the Chicago fire before us regarding that. One enterprising man of St. Louis, I am told, after the Chicago fire sold his property in St. Louis, from which he realized about $250,000, and went immediately to Chicago and planted it there among its ashes, and he has realized a fortune from that venture of $25,000,000. Such a project properly backed and indorsed in some way by the National Government, or aided in some way by the National Government, with the stamp of approval by the National Government, would be taken up by the entire country in the shape of a popular subscription; and with $50,000,000 put into improvements upon property conveyed to such a corporation by people who are unable to improve that property, the property being taken at its just and fair value, based upon present conditions, such a project could not but prove immensely profitable.

It seems to me it is important that the nation itself should take part in this great work just as it has in all great expositions of manufacture and commerce. We could accompany any legislation which we propose here by a provision that the plans proposed and the expenditures made should be subject to the approval of a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and acting in cooperation with the local authorities. And doubtless the President of the United States would select from the great body of exposition builders such men as Burnham, of Chicago; Carrerre, of New York; McKim, of New York, and the leader of the St. Louis exposition, men who would give energy and direction to a movement which would result in the restoration of San Francisco within a year or a year and a half.

EFFECTS OF THE DISASTER NOT YET FELT BY THE NATION.

The country does not realize as yet how hard hit it is by the San Francisco catastrophe. I speak not simply of California, or the Pacific coast, but I speak of the entire country, for it is interested in all forms of investment there. The East owns all the railroads that traverse that country, and a blow to those railroads is a blow to the East itself. It seems to me it is entirely practical either that we should give direct aid and credit to the city of San Francisco or that we should indorse some financial corporation, properly guarded, that will relieve the entire situation.

THE FUTURE OF SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. President, in this connection I wish to say that it is of the highest importance that the plans shall be broad and comprehensive. San Francisco prior to the fire had just entered upon an era of enlarged development. She had employed Mr. Burnham, of Chicago, the builder of the great White City, to prepare plans, and doubtless those plans will be largely followed. Probably hereafter the city will be divided by intersecting parkways, one parkway running north and south and the other east and west, so as to divide the city into four sections, each of which will be protected by the space from fire in the other, and the sea wall will be laid out upon lines of beauty as well as of utility. Doubtless a great boulevard on the water front will open up the incomparable view of water and mountain, at the same time meeting every demand of trade and commerce.

The position of San Francisco is unsurpassed so far as commercial advantage is concerned and so far as beauty of scenery is concerned. From the hills of that city you can view the ocean upon one side and the bay upon the other, with the enduring mountains in easy reach, a variety of view and landscape and a perfection of climate and opportunities for ease and comfort and pleasure unsurpassed by any city in the United States. All that San Francisco lacks is the money with which to make its restoration complete and with which to make that city one of the most beautiful and prosperous in the world. If this is done the late calamity will be regarded as a benefaction rather than as a misfortune, and a new San Francisco, incomparable in beauty and prosperity, will rise upon the ashes of the old.

Mr. President, I wish to ask whether there is any objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution, which commits the Senate to nothing, but simply provides for an inquiry?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada asks for the present consideration of the resolution submitted by him. Is there objection?

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have it read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again read the resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. Without the whereases. They merely present a statement of the conditions, and the resolution proper, the thing we want to consider, the working part of it, is all that it is necessary to read.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to have it all read.

Mr. TILLMAN. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada wish the preamble and the resolution read?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes; I should like to have it all read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, without objection.

The Secretary again read the concurrent resolution.

SENATOR FLINT URGES IMMEDIATE ACTION.

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on the resolution that has just been read. I ask for the immediate consideration of this resolution, as I do not want the people of my State, and especially those in San Francisco who are working to rebuild that city, which has been almost destroyed, buoyed up by false hopes that the Congress of the United States will make an appropriation of a hundred million dollars for their relief. They should not be left in doubt as to what action Congress will take in this matter.

The members of the California delegation have been working to carry out every wish of the people of that State and to aid them as far as it is possible for them to do so. A committee of business men from the State of California is now on the way east to present matters to the California delegation which, in their opinion, will relieve the situation, so as to enable the California delegation to intelligently present the needs of the people of the State to Congress. It therefore seems to me that if action on this resolution should be delayed it would have an injurious effect upon the people who are expecting aid in the matter of rebuilding San Francisco.

Two propositions are presented—one is a newspaper clipping which has been read, being the plan outlined by the Senator from Nevada, by which the people in New York are to aid the people of San Francisco by a loan. The second is the plan outlined in the resolution asking Congress to make a loan or guarantee a loan.

The members of the Senate and House from the State of California in all probability will have some definite plan to present for the relief of the people of our State, and we do not want to have them relying upon an appropriation from Congress, and then fail to secure such an appropriation, when they may have an opportunity to adopt another plan. For that reason I ask that the resolution may be acted upon, and if it is possible to have Congress make an appropriation or guarantee a loan I should be very glad to have this action taken.

There are many matters in which we are asking assistance at this time, not only to help those who are desirous of erecting steel-frame buildings in San Francisco, but also to supply the people with meat and bread who are walking the streets homeless and hungry. That is what immediately confronts us, and the California delegation are now devoting their energies to the relief of the destitute and suffering people and will be glad to cooperate in carrying out any plan that will relieve the people of our State.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from California will not feel that I have trenched at all upon the province of the Senators from that State in making the suggestion. I do not know whether he was in the Senate Chamber when I opened my remarks, but I stated then that I had designedly failed to consult them regarding it, because I did not wish to put upon them the responsibility either of accepting it or of rejecting it; that I knew the great courage and self-reliance of the people of that State, and I knew their first disposition would be to rely upon themselves.

Mr. FLINT. I have no feeling in that way, and I know my colleague has not. I heard the remarks of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator, then, has no misapprehension upon that subject.

I wish to say further that all my interviews in New York were of a confidential character, and that my telegram to the West was in confidence, and I never expected to make this a public matter. But inasmuch as the telegram has gone to the entire country, stating that I had conducted a successful negotiation through which $100,000,000 had been raised for the purpose of restoring San Francisco, I thought it only fair and candid that I should make a thorough exposition of the matter to the Senate and the country.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that this resolution has been offered at the present time. Congress and the country generally have responded most generously and most liberally to the call that has come to them because of the distress of our people, brought on by this great calamity. I am informed that the legislature of California is about to be convened in extra session. The municipal authorities of San Francisco, the board of supervisors, have not yet had an official session since the great calamity visited the city. Certainly, for one, I should be opposed to any action on the part of Congress until a request had come to us through our legislature or through the municipal authorities of San Francisco. And then it would be a question of expediency or policy whether it is advisable for the Government to aid in such an undertaking as this. The sentiment expressed by the Senator from Nevada I know is actuated and prompted by the most generous impulses, but it is a grave question in my mind whether it is practicable and expedient, even if it is constitutional, to extend aid in this way.

But, be that as it may, at this time California is simply asking the Government to restore the Government buildings there that have suffered, and suffered very much less indeed than those of the municipality and those of private owners. Congress has responded most generously. Bills for that purpose are now pending before the Committees on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I have assurances that they will be considered and favorably reported to Congress, and judging by the course that Congress has heretofore pursued they will be favorably passed upon. That is all that the California delegation in Congress feel called upon at this time to ask of Congress, that it will simply make appropriations to restore to good order the Government buildings which have been damaged and to construct proper depot buildings for the headquarters of the Army and Navy in San Francisco.

I hope my colleague, therefore, will consent that the resolution of inquiry proposed by the Senator from Nevada may go to the Committee on Finance, there to be properly considered. If my friend the Senator from Nevada had consulted the delegation from California in Congress about the resolution, they would have endeavored to persuade him to withhold action at this time.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to say that in this matter I am taking my individual responsibility as a Senator of a neighboring State interested in the welfare of California and entitled to its view as to the speed of restoration of the great port of that coast and a great port of the United States. I regret very much that my action does not meet with the approval of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], but notwithstanding I should have pursued this course, and for the following reasons:

San Francisco has been almost in a state of chaos. Order has been maintained there only by practical martial law. How are the people of that city in a condition to bring forward any practicable plan which in its operation will embrace the cooperation of the entire United States? The State has been shaken, also, for San Francisco is the heart of the State, and when you paralyze San Francisco you paralyze the State. When the legislature of that State is convened, I ask how can it meet this question adequately unless it knows the attitude of the United States Government and the attitude of financiers generally toward the question of restoration; whether they are to rely absolutely upon themselves or whether they may expect reasonable aid, both from the Government and from the people of their sister States?

PRECEDENTS FOR GOVERNMENT GUARANTEE OF SAN FRANCISCO BONDS.

It will go a great way in the shapping of their deliberations if they can know definitely and conclusively that the Congress of the United States will not consider any measure for their relief. Even that certainty would be a blessing. One of the conditions to be overcome is the uncertainty that exists, and that uncertainty would have existed whether the resolution had been introduced or not. A pronouncement came from leading men in that city advising national aid in the way of a guaranty. They had seen that we had practically guaranteed the bonds of a Philippine railroad. They knew we had guaranteed the bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad and the Southern Pacific Railroad and the Texas Pacific Railroad. They knew that the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its power relating to interstate commerce and foreign commerce, and having regard for the welfare of the entire nation, had not hesitated to give its credit and to advance its moneys—the moneys of the entire people—for the prosperity and welfare of the entire people. And realizing the value of their port to the entire United States, they had suggested national cooperation in a local restoration of national importance.

IMMEDIATE ACTION IMPERATIVE.

It is important, therefore, that they should have a definite answer as quickly as possible. If they are to rely upon themselves, and the great people of the United States are to rely upon them, to accomplish a great national purpose, the restoration of a harbor and port essential to interstate and foreign commerce, it is important that they should know it.

Mr. FLINT. That is all I ask.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not misapprehend at all the Senator from California. I quite agree with him. What he wants is certainty, and he wants it as quickly as possible.

Now, with those few words of explanation I shall have no objection whatever, as the senior Senator from California proposes that the resolution shall go to the Committee on Finance for consideration, to that reference. So I will not now press its consideration unless he has modified his view. But I wish to add just one word. The purpose of the resolution is simply an inquiry by a committee of the Senate and by a committee of the House, but it puts us upon inquiry contemporaneously with the people of San Francisco and of California.

If the legislature of California shall have something to propose, we will be ready to act, or if they are not ready to propose anything, we may have something to suggest. The minds of all good people in the United States ought now to be engaged upon this great problem, and there should be no more inertia or inactivity here than there is in San Francisco or Sacramento. Over 200,000 people are there now without adequate shelter; thousands are dependent on charity for food. Such conditions are necessarily demoralizing. If they scatter, it will be no light task to reassemble them. What they need is not so much charity, but work, which will make benevolence unnecessary. This will restore confidence, maintain the city's population, and secure the city's growth. Delay means disaster. San Francisco's task in restoring her system of schools, police, and municipal administration is itself sufficient for the strength of her authorities. We should think for her in much that relates to the financing of her restoration.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance. I appreciate the force of the suggestions made by the junior Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], and I assure the Senate that the committee will take up the resolution and act upon it promptly and report it back with their judgment as to the suggestions contained therein.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island moves that the concurrent resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILROAD DISCRIMINATIONS AND MONOPOLIES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I send to the desk a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to send to the Senate as soon as practicable all the findings of fact and its conclusions thereon in regard to the subjects now under investigation or already investigated by it under joint resolution No. 32, approved March 7, 1906, as amended March 21, 1906.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, but I do not see what the Senator is going to get by it. The Commission is still investigating the subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will explain it to the Senator. The Senate will recall the fact that on the 7th of March I introduced, by order of the Interstate Commerce Committee or upon its approval, a joint resolution, instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make certain investigations in relation to coal and oil and their transportation.

This work has been carried on more or less diligently and the newspapers have been quite full of a good many statements purporting to be the evidence or the facts brought out in that investigation. Those statements, if they are true, would bear very directly and be an important light on the rate bill which will come up for debate day after to-morrow. It is with a view of getting anything the Commission has now in the way of facts that I want to have the resolution passed.

Mr. KEAN. But the Senator asks in the resolution that the Commission shall state their findings and conclusions.

Mr. TILLMAN. If they have not made any conclusions, they will not give us any.

Mr. KEAN. How can they reach any conclusions until they have completed their work?

Mr. TILLMAN. I say if they have not reached any conclusions they will not give them to us.

Mr. KEAN. As I said, I have no objection to the resolution, but I can not see how the Senator is going to accomplish anything by it.

Mr. TILLMAN. If I do not get anything, it will be because I throw my net in a place where there are no fish. I believe there are some fish in there.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROPOSED METROPOLITAN POLICE INVESTIGATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from yesterday.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume that is the resolution which I offered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is nearly 2 o'clock, and I ask that the resolution may go over and retain its place, or that it shall be subject to call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over, retaining its place, subject to the call of the Senator from South Carolina.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] is ready to proceed.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12987) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, in the case of Railway Company v. Gill (156 U. S. Rep., p. 666), the Supreme Court, citing Mr. Justice Miller, uses the following language:

The remedy for a tariff alleged to be unreasonable should be sought in a bill in equity or some equivalent proceeding wherein the rights of the public, as well as those of the company complaining, can be protected.

Two things have been determined by the Supreme Court on this subject:

First. That the question of the justice or reasonableness of a rate requires juridical process to determine it.

Second. That the juridical process which now exists and is proper in the premises is a bill in equity, "else some equivalent proceeding."

HOW THE ABOLITION OF THE INTERLOCUTORY INJUNCTION WOULD LEAVE THE RATE QUESTION.

The amendment to abolish the interlocutory injunction leaves the question of a rate suspended in the air, denied the full remedy of equity which is there referred to, and with no equivalent proceeding to substitute it.

In the course of his observations on this subject in the debate, the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] said:

The only possible way to protect the Commission and to protect the people against frivolous suits instituted in bad faith is to provide that the court can not set aside the rate until the question has been fully adjudicated.

Two troubles suggest themselves to my mind about this declaration. They are practical difficulties and are hard to get over.

First. If a court can not act by interlocutory injunction on the question whether a rate is just until the whole case is fully heard, great delay may ensue in the application of any remedy. Pending that delay, the irreparable injury which has invoked equity jurisdiction may come to pass and be largely consummated.

Second. If the jurisdiction of the court be nullified for any period and if its preventive hand be stayed by positive law for that period, obviously there is created a wrong without a remedy. That wrong is a constitutional wrong. That wrong consists in the continuous, and for the time uninterrupted, taking of property without just compensation which is corresponsive to its use. Nature abhors a vacuum. So does justice. The equity devised to fill the vacuum being denied, the vacuum remains.

The weak spot in the argument for making the order to correct delay lies in the fact that the Supreme Court, if it adheres to its present views of equity jurisdiction, would ignore the act of Congress, unless a judicial revolution takes place.

I have been asked the question, Mr. President, if I conceive that the jurisdiction of the high court of chancery in Great Britain was made a part of the due process of law of this country. My reply was it was not. Nevertheless it is also true that the general principles of equity jurisprudence as known to the high court of chancery were made a part of our jurisprudence, and are always put in play when without them there is no remedy with which a party may defend a right held to be one under the protection of the juridical process of the country.

Observe, Mr. President, I do not say all rights. There are many rights of the citizen of the most sacred character which are disposable by administrative process; but when there is a right the disposition of which can not be effected without juridical process, and when the law has not provided a complete and adequate remedy equity jurisprudence will always assert itself; and in that fact lies the great place which equity jurisprudence has obtained for itself in the judgment of mankind and in its adoption as a part of our State and Federal institutions.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY.

The general limits of the equitable jurisdiction of the Federal court, as has been stated time and again, are those that prevailed at the time when the Constitution was adopted and were recognized by the high court of chancery in England. It is provided in the Revised Statutes of the United States, section 723, that suits in equity shall not be sustained in the courts of the United States in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law. This section is regarded simply as declaratory of the law as it existed when the Federal Constitution was adopted. The Supreme Court of the United States has said on this subject, in the case of the Mississippi Mills v. Cohn (150 U. S., 206), that the inquiry to be made to ascertain whether or not a particular case is cognizable in equity in a Federal court is this: Whether by the principles of common law and equity, as distinguished and defined in this and the mother country, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, the relief sought was one obtainable in a court of law, or one which only a court of equity was fully competent to yield.

It is obvious, Mr. President, that in the state of the law on this subject as we find it to-day this remedy of the bill in equity and the injunction process is one which only a court of equity is competent to yield; and it is obvious also that if you paralyze the interlocutory injunction, which is the hand that it uplifts in order to yield it, you strike down and withdraw for that whole period the protecting hand of any court of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, this interlocutory injunction in this particular case belongs, as it would seem to me, to that class of cases to which Judge Curtis referred in the great leading Hoboken Land Company case, in 18 Howard, when he said that he would not contend that cases could be withdrawn from equity jurisdiction. I venture to say, though I can not declare that I have investigated every one of the cases which have been cited here in debate, that when you examine the record of those cases you will find that where Congress has eliminated any part of an ancient process their action has been sustained because the party who had the right to the benefit of that process have been left with full and adequate remedies, which he could assert instead thereof. This is notably true in that case which has been cited here, I believe, by several of the debaters on this subject—the case of Bank of Columbia v. Oakley (4 Wheat., 235)—where, in an old statute passed five years after the revolution, an execution was allowed to be issued by a bank in certain cases, and Congress subsequently withdrew the right to issue that execution. The court said Congress had all right to give the execution and had all right to take it away, but after it had taken it away it left the party in full possession of his rights at common law, and they were perfectly effective to secure and protect him. But if you deprive in this case the party who is entitled thereto under the settled system of procedure by interlocutory injunction, which has perfected itself in our courts, you leave that party naked and remediless to correct the intervening evil.

SHIPPERS AIDED IF BETTER PROCEDURE CAN BE SUPPLIED.

Now, Mr. President, I do not agree with any of those gentlemen who have asserted that the only possible way of protecting the people—the shippers, the passengers; that mass of people to whom we should have a clear eye and should endeavor to protect by every means in our power—is by stopping the interlocutory injunction. The equity procedure in this case has grown out of the fact that Congress has not provided any other procedure which would reach the evil complained of. It was wise in the eminent judge, who used the sentence with which I began my remarks, to say that that proceeding or some equivalent proceeding was the system that should be followed.

AN EQUIVALENT PROCEEDING TO THE BILL IN EQUITY CAN BE PROVIDED.

When the Interstate Commerce Commission has got through with its work and its administrative duty is completed, it is the consensus of this body, if I may judge by the many expressions of opinion which have been made by gentlemen in debate, that there should be a review provided for. It was assumed in the bill and justly under the decision which I have read, and under many others which might be quoted, that equity would intervene. So it would. But there is no difficulty, according to our American systems of jurisprudence and according to the elasticity and inventiveness of Congressional legislation, to provide any other remedy which you please which will reach the case and make itself perfect to guard all the rights that are involved therein.

A SUITABLE REMEDY PROPER TO THE NATURE OF THE CASE AND SANCTIONED BY USAGE SUFFICES.

There is a notable case about due process of law in the State of Michigan. It is that of Attorney-General v. Jochim, 99 Michigan, 371. Judge Hooker, in that case, sums up the principle which underlies due process of law. I will not read all of this able opinion, but here is the sum of it in conclusion:

> It is in all cases that kind of procedure which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case and sanctioned by the established customs and usages of the courts.

The kind of procedure which is suitable and proper to the nature of the case and which has been sanctioned by the established customs and usages of the courts of the United States ever since this became a juridical question is the stretching forth of the equitable act and the issuing of the interlocutory injunction to prevent intermediate wrong. But at the same time that the courts have done that they have recognized the fact that it was within the power and within the discretion of Congress, if they chose to do it, to provide any other more convenient, more flexible, or more suitable method that would substitute the equitable relief and equally guard and defend the litigants.

APPEALS, WRITS OF ERROR, BILLS IN EQUITY, WRITS OF CERTIORARI, AND PETITIONS FOR REVIEW.

Now, Mr. President, what forms might a measure emanating from this body take? First, that of an appeal to any appropriate court. Doubt has been suggested as to every idea which has been put forward as to methods of procedure in cases before the Interstate Commerce Commission. Appeal, it is true, is borrowed from the civil law. It is usual in equitable cases. It translates to the upper court the whole case.

Writ of error is a common-law writ, applicable in its methods to cases before courts and juries in which common-law rights have been litigated.

The writ of certiorari is another way in which superior courts require the records of inferior ones to be brought before them, and the learning on the subject is complete. It is a known system, which is now fully in vogue and practice.

Then there is another method. It is one which has originated out of our American concerns. I find an illustration of it in an act of Congress of March 3, 1851. It is a petition for review, and it is provided by section 9 of that act, which is entitled "An act to ascertain and settle the private land claims in the State of California," that an appeal or petition of review rather, to use the accurate word of the statute, will lie from a decision of the three commissioners who settled the land claims in California to the United States court, and that with that petition the review should be a transcript of the whole record of the case. That case was carried into the United States Supreme Court without any objection on the part of that body to this method of procedure.

I cite the section here that the method may be fully seen:

> SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of the rejection or confirmation of any claim by the board of commissioners, it shall and may be lawful for the claimant or the district attorney, in behalf of the United States, to present a petition to the district court of the district in which the land claimed is situated, praying the said court to review the decision of the said commissioners, and to decide on the validity of such claim; and such petition, if presented by the claimant, shall set forth fully the nature of the claim and the names of the original and present claimants, and shall contain a deraignment of the claimant's title, together with a transcript of the report of the board of commissioners, and of the documentary evidence and testimony of the witnesses on which it was founded; and such petition, if presented by the district attorney in behalf of the United States, shall be accompanied by a transcript of the report of the board of commissioners, and of the papers and evidence on which it was founded, and shall fully and distinctly set forth the grounds on which the said claim is alleged to be invalid, a copy of which petition, if the same shall be presented by a claimant, shall be served on the district attorney of the United States, and, if presented in behalf of the United States, shall be served on the claimant or his attorney; and the party upon whom such service shall be made shall be bound to answer the same within a time to be prescribed by the judge of the district court; and the answer of the claimant to such petition shall set forth fully the nature of the claim, and the names of the original and present claimants, and shall contain a deraignment of the claimant's title; and the answer of the district attorney in behalf of the United States shall fully and distinctly set forth the grounds on which the said claim is alleged to be invalid, copies of which answer shall be served upon the adverse party thirty days before the meeting of the court, and thereupon, at the first term of the court thereafter, the said case shall stand for trial, unless, on cause shown, the same shall be continued by the court.

There are several other cases, Mr. President—the cases of the Cherokee Nation against Southern Kansas R. R., 135 U. S., 641, the case of U. S. v. Duell, 172 U. S., 576, an appeal from the Commissioner of Patents; and the Fossat case, 2 Wallace, 649, are instances. Wherever Congress has been of opinion that it could devise a method of procedure not strictly in the lines of equity and not strictly in the lines of common law, but could use the writs, petitions, and other agencies known to the law to put a case decided by commissions, by boards, by department officers, or others before the courts, there is no possible constitutional objection to it; and it has been done in practice, approved by the Supreme Court of the United States, and acknowledged in at least three separate courses of procedure which I have examined.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that if Congress desires to do something that is practicable for the benefit of the shippers and travelers of this country, to assure to them their rights, and put into their hands the methods of defense which they can promptly use, they should not leave it to equity to beat its own pathway over a country which the law had not explored, but should itself explore that country and should then devise and adopt the methods of procedure and jurisprudence which will best effectuate the remedy in view.

PROPER PROVISIONS FOR A REVIEW.

Provide a petition of review in the United States court, and require, first, that all the parties put in their evidence before the Interstate Commerce Commission; provide, second, that no other evidence shall be heard in a court thereafter unless such evidence as could not have been obtained by due diligence until after the Interstate Commerce Commission had disposed of the case; third, require a copy of the record to be carried up before the court which is thus appealed to; fourth, require that notice be given—say, five days—by any person moving to suspend or enjoin the action of the Commission; fifth, require that a full bond be given, and see that that bond defended and covered all the rights of the case before the party gets a suspending order; sixth, require that the case shall be made a preferred one on the docket and shall be promptly heard, and, seventh, as far as practicable to do so, assure that hearing during that period of time when the Commission's order is suspended by itself and is not declared to be in force, covering the period that might come thereafter by requiring a good bond to be given.

Now, I should like to know upon what ground can such a system as that be challenged? The right of due process of law, fundamentally speaking, is the right to be heard fairly and fully. Will it be said that the courts must take all the evidence over again? Who more competent to take evidence in such a case than the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the lawyers of each side to superintend it? Will it be said that they are not just as competent as any casual notary public or commissioner in chancery or justice of the peace, who in this State or that is the usual person for taking testimony?

I undertake to say that no more respectable, no more intelligent, and no better informed commissioners for taking testimony could be devised by law than the Interstate Commerce Commission. To guard against mistake, and in the full grace of generous law, any evidence that they had not put in and could not have obtained by due diligence, let them put in. Does anyone suggest that the courts would not permit this limitation upon testimony? Hardly, I think. But suppose the court did, no damage would be done, for the court would simply admit other testimony and take it de novo, and your statute would not be set aside as unconstitutional, because it did not foreclose the door or prevent the court from ruling, whatever its conscience and its learning and its judgment might dictate upon the subject.

SWIFT AND FINAL HEARING SHOULD BE PROMOTED.

Unless, Mr. President, we shall give attention to the subject, avoid the delays which have brought the Interstate Commerce Commission, unjustly in some cases, under criticism and rebuke, put parties back, and so postpone their rights that the case was virtually lost in benefit to them before it was heard, this bill will multiply its present deficiencies and will be a sorer disappointment to the people than it would otherwise be, even with the many deficiencies which it contains.

The bill is far from a complete one; but if in this measure we can secure the one thing that is obtainable, a swift hearing before a competent tribunal upon that question in which the tribunals all hold they must have the opportunity to hear—if that is done, you will have positive and veritable progress in the right direction.

All reforms, Mr. President, have always moved slowly. The greatest difficulties in reforms are often found in the over-eagerness of their advocates and in their desire to accomplish everything at once. Any positive, firm step forward is a great advancement, either in jurisprudence or in economics, and this point has focused the attention and elicited the debate of the best minds in the Senate over and over again, because they realize that it is therein the people may be disappointed and that it is therein they are looking for some relief and progress in their methods of getting right before the tribunals of the country.

I do not dispute, Mr. President, and I shall not dispute, the right of Congress to control the jurisdiction of the courts. It is not true, as a general principle, that whatever either the Senate creates or the House of Representatives or Congress creates it can destroy. The power to destroy is not coeval with or coequal with the power to create, and the second is not the corrollary of the other, but with respect to the jurisdiction of courts which the Constitution has committed entirely to the jurisdiction of Congress, undoubtedly the Congressional power to create is the power to destroy. Senators hold up their hands in holy horror at the idea suggested to their minds that Congress has the power to destroy the inferior tribunals of the country. It is no new thing, Mr. President. They have had that power ever since this Government was created, and they have had the power to destroy the country, too, by taxation. Any man who has a pistol in his hand has the power to shoot another, but it does not follow that he is going to do it, and it does not follow that Congress is going to destroy anything that is wise and good.

There is no disposition, here, Mr. President, to destroy either the general jurisdiction of the inferior courts or the courts themselves. Congress has always treated, and continues to treat, the courts with the highest respect and to make full and generous provision for them. It has given their judges salaries higher than it gives it own Members; it has amplified their conveniences with libraries, and upheld them in the exercise of their offices; it has made provision for the retirement of judges on pay; and these suggestions of alarm or danger, it seems to me, rather arise from the exigencies of argument than from any composed view of the public situation or any alarm for the good of the country.

But, Mr. President, the destruction of the courts or changing the courts is an utterly and wholly different thing from endeavoring to declare how a court, whose general jurisdiction is maintained, shall do or not do about a particular case or a particular class of cases. I am apprehensive that, if the Congress of the United States were to enact that a court of equity, which has jurisdiction of the case, might still keep that jurisdiction, but should not exercise it in that particular case which particularly invoked it, and then by so doing leave a wrong existent without a remedy—I am apprehensive that the courts might say as to that particular item of statutory law, that it was unconstitutional and left the case entirely without the due process of law which is habitual and in constant practice in all such cases as this.

THE EXTENT OF JURIDICAL INTERFERENCE AS TO RATES.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say something about reasonable rates. In the case of Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company v. Wellman (143 U. S., 339), the Supreme Court, in answer to a suggestion that the legislature had no authority to prescribe maximum rates for railroad transportation, through Judge Brewer said:

> The legislature has power to fix rates, and the extent of judicial interference is protection against unreasonable rates.

There, Mr. President, in two lines and one sentence you have the sum of equitable jurisprudence, apart from its practice, of the United States Supreme Court on this subject.

In the case of Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Company (154 U. S., 397), Judge Brewer expressed pretty similar ideas in this language:

> The courts are not authorized to revise or change the body of rates imposed by a legislature or a commission; they do not determine whether one rate is preferable to another, or whether under all circumstances would be fair and reasonable as between the carriers and the shippers; they do not engage in any mere administrative work.

JUST COMPENSATION THE SOLE ISSUE BEFORE THE COURTS.

So, Mr. President, the sole function of the court is to hear the case, to suspend decision until it is fully heard, and at the end of that time to ask itself the question, "Is this rate just; and, if unjust, does it impose upon the carrier, and in a confiscatory sense?" And unless the court sees palpably and plainly, and is clearly of opinion, that it does so impose upon the carrier it dismisses the procedure.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that the term "reasonable rates," the term "just rates," and the term "fair return for service and property," and the term "fair remuneration" are sometimes used in discussing this subject. The appropriate term to use, and the only legal term which properly defines the issue before a Federal court, is the term "just compensation." I like that word "just." It is the ancient term of our fathers, embedded in the jurisprudence which they brought with them from the mother land; it is a yardstick of morality and justice, which commands to the mind that is measuring property, Be just.

The term "reasonable" is used time and again throughout many decisions of the Supreme Court. It has been used in debate here, and it is commonly used in conversation between learned men, as well as amongst those who do not weigh the precise meaning of terms, as the synonym of "just." That term "reasonable" has a different origin as applicable to this case. It is a term of commerce and common law rather than a term of the Constitution. It is more elastic and flexible than "just." It is like the quantum meruit in an action of assumpsit—what do the services merit—or like the quantum valebant in an action of assumpsit—what is this property worth? It does not string up and confine the mind of the judge to the severe and proper question, Is this price just, is it right?

Mr. President, I will read on this question a note, and a very valuable note, of Judge Noyes, in his book on American Railroad Rates. Judge Noyes is a scholar, a jurist, and a railroad president. He has no relation to this case which might possibly class him amongst those who were too partial toward popular as against vested rights. In his book on Railroad Rates, on page 212, he says:

> Dicta may be found in this—
> The decision on which he is commenting—
> and in other decisions to the effect the courts may prevent the enforcement of a schedule of rates made by a railroad commission upon the ground that it is unreasonable. The word "unreasonable" in this case and most others is, however, used in the sense of "confiscatory." If a broader meaning were intended the dicta would not seem well founded. As we have seen, when the legislature confers upon a commission discretionary power to make a rate, the result of the commission's action is the same as if the legislature itself had acted. The rate when made is made by legislative authority. It becomes in legal effect a law. The courts can deal with it only with respect to its constitutionality. If not confiscatory it is not invalid. The question is not whether the legislative-made rate is unreasonable, but whether it is so unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property. As said by the Supreme Court of the United States in its latest decision upon the subject (Minneapolis Railroad Company v. Minnesota, 186 United States Reports, 268, decided in 1902), in holding rates made by the Minnesota commission valid: "The action of the commission in fixing the rate complained of as to this particular class of freight has not been shown to be so unjust or unreasonable as to amount to a taking of property without due process of law."

The reasoning, Mr. President, of Judge Noyes in this note to his valuable book is so clear that he who runs may read it. It is so convincing that any suggestion to the contrary of its conclusions, whether made in the able and considerate speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] or by anyone else on this floor, is obliged to fail as soon as that mirror is held up to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and to the analysis of a clear mind that can read and appreciate their meaning.

WHAT IS "REASONABLE" IS AN ADMINISTRATIVE QUESTION UNLESS THE UNREASONABLENESS AMOUNTS TO CONFISCATION.

Let me add, Mr. President, to these reflections of Judge Noyes, that the question whether a rate is reasonable or not, unless it be so unreasonable that it amounts to a taking of property without just compensation, is purely an administrative question. Such is the flexibility of the human mind and such are the variations in the situations and conditions of properties that there is obliged to be in reason a margin of price or a margin of value. While we assess values for taxes and for other purposes in the accurate expressions of dollars and cents, it is impossible in the nature of things to measure them by any such precise scale as you may apply in the apothecary shop or by the refined instrumentalities of physical science; but in so far as the question lies within the range of reasonableness it is not a judicial question, and can not be made one unless the unreasonableness is so great and is so patent that the mind can discern the fact that in adopting that rate the property has been taken without just compensation. So that, whether you were to approach this line of thought upon the question of reasonableness or upon the question of just compensation, the mind is obliged to wind up in holding up to itself the one standard of the Constitution—"Is this just as a return for that property or that service?"

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Senator think that the rate which affords just compensation for the service rendered is a reasonable rate?

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. And that a rate which does not afford just compensation is an unreasonable rate?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not care to enter into any speculations which do not belong to the controversy.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not entering into any speculations at all.

Mr. DANIEL. Neither am I.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am asking a simple question.

Mr. DANIEL. Well, what is it?

Mr. ALDRICH. I asked the Senator whether he thought that a rate which afforded just compensation for the service rendered was a reasonable rate.

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. And that a rate which did not afford just compensation was an unreasonable rate.

Mr. DANIEL. I should like to take time to reflect on that question.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the whole controversy, as I understand it.

Mr. DANIEL. It may be or not, but I am not answering unnecessary questions. I am arguing the case which is before us and as the courts have put it, but I have seen courts impair the force of their opinions by obiter dicta and I have seen Senators ruin good points by making bad ones. The point which I make is—and I set it forth clear as a flag which all men can see—that the Supreme Court of the United States says that the question is one of just compensation, and that wherever it has used the word "reasonable" instead of "just," it meant "just," but was, perhaps, a little infelicitous in terms, as I might also be if I were to stop to answer questions that do not belong to the gravamen of this controversy.

WHY THE TERM "JUST" IS DIFFERENTIATED FROM THE TERM "REASONABLE."

Mr. President, I want to show how this question arises or where it comes from. Why is it that this question of what is a just rate has been differentiated by the courts of the United States from the great mass of matters purely administrative which are passed on by the President, by the courts not sitting in court, but as the delegates of Congress in fixing rates, and by all our Cabinet ministers? If we were to seek the genesis of the idea of the courts of the United States that a rate was a matter which must be passed on by juridical process, instead of being concluded by administrative process, we would probably find that it originates in part in the Constitution of the United States in the conference of equitable powers upon the judiciary. It would probably be found also in the great attention which was paid to the fourteenth amendment after the civil war.

It took a long time, Mr. President, after the war was over to get the feverishness out of the blood which war had engendered. A large portion of the people looked more and more to the courts for the guardianship of rights, and in the fourteenth amendment, too, there was a clause as to equal rights and as to due process of law.

Chief Justice Waite, in the case of Munn v. Illinois, calls attention to the fact that, while the term "due process of law" had been in the Constitution of the United States by the fifth amendment since the foundation of the Government, it was not until after the fourteenth amendment was adopted that the courts began to apply it to cases of this description or to conceive that it was applicable to those cases in which States or communities regulated common carriers and prescribed rates of hire for their service and use by the people. Whatever may be the tracery and trail of the genesis of the doctrine, its headquarters are found now in the various provisions of the Constitution of the United States to which the judges referred in applying it.

THE JURIDICAL QUESTIONS THAT ARISE UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

We have, first, in the fifth amendment to the Constitution that no person can be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." What is due process of law is thus made a Federal and constitutional question.

Second. The words that follow in the fifth amendment to the Constitution are "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation;" so that a second Federal and constitutional question is presented in the inquiry, "Is this rate prescribed for the use of the property and service employed in interstate commerce just compensation therefor?"

Third. Sometimes the question of equal protection of the laws becomes a Federal and constitutional question, although by consequential effect, rather than by the direct words of the fourteenth amendment as applicable to the Congress of the United States.

No State—

Says the fourteenth amendment; not Congress—can deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law—

That applies to States—

nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

So that equal protection of the laws as well as what is due process of law arises in every State of this Union as a question in the conduct of State regulation of its domestic affairs, including transportation. Originating as an inquiry in the State, under the fourteenth amendment, in the first instance, it becomes, the moment that the State passes on that inquiry, a question of Federal jurisdiction in the Federal courts. But, Mr. President, the principles upon which these inhibitions upon the State are based and embodied in our organic law are such that, overspreading as they do the area and embracing as they do the whole population of the United States, they have, as it were, by percolation, gone into and been absorbed by the chancellors of the country, and are almost as persuasive in Federal affairs, though they are not in the terms of the Constitution directly a limitation upon this body. It is by these various clauses of the Federal Constitution that the shipper and the carrier in the United States find their protection against the oppressive, extortionate, and discriminatory schedules fixed in transportation by the directories of corporations engaged in interstate commerce or fixed by the Commission, should they, in executing either a legislative or, in Federal affairs, a Congressional enactment to regulate commerce, apply unjust standards.

RATES MUST BE PALPABLY UNREASONABLE AND UNJUST TO JUSTIFY JUDICIAL INTERFERENCE.

It results, Mr. President, from this standard of just compensation, from its being made a constitutional question, that the carrier engaged in interstate commerce can demand just compensation for the use of his property, and just compensation only, and the shipper can accordingly get remedy in the courts for any excessive rate which may be charged against him. The courts have never been given authority by Congress, and do not assume constitutional power or jurisdiction, to supervise commissioners or boards in every respect, nor in any respect, saving only in that particular respect which relates to the justness of the rate fixed by the Commission or the board. Many times in addition to those cases to which I have referred have the courts so declared.

The courts can not, after the board has fully and fairly investigated and acted by fixing what it believes to be reasonable rates, step in and say its action shall be set aside and nullified because the courts upon a similar investigation have come to a different conclusion as to the reasonableness of the rates fixed.

So, while the court in this opinion is using the word "reasonable" it is acting upon it as if it meant "just," for it says that even though the court may say it is not reasonable, in its own judgment, it can not set it aside, showing how vain it would be for us to put that question before the court.

There must be actual fraud in fixing the rates or they must be so palpably and grossly unreasonable and unjust as to amount to the same thing.

This language which I have just quoted is the language of the supreme court of California in the Springs Valley Waterworks case, 82 California, 286. It is made a part of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered by Judge Harlan in the San Diego Land Company case, 174 United States, 750. I shall presently refer further to that case, for it is, to my mind, one of the most clear, equitable, and just of all the many essays which have emanated from the courts on this subject.

WHAT IS JUST COMPENSATION?

Mr. President, let us ask ourselves what is this just compensation which is to be the standard. I know of no words which may synonymously interpret these two plain words. Of course, justice, like every attribute or virtue which is intelligently exercised, must float in the atmosphere of reasonableness. But when one comes to exercise simply the faculty of reason without straightening it up to the ideal of justice, there is more flexibility about it than when the moral idea is impressed upon the conscience and when the conscience and the intellect, as it were, are commanded to pull together. When you put into a statute new words, like "fairly remunerative," you are suggesting to the mind a new train of thought not suggested by "just compensation." You are getting out of the four corners of the Constitution of the United States. You are getting away also from the old body of common law, which applied reason. You are holding dangling, as it were, before the eye of desire remuneration, profit, greed, ambition, and all that train of things that appeal to the human imagination when it fixes its eye and follows the trail of attention in that direction.

Woe be unto him who upsetteth the landmark! Just compensation is an ancient landmark and a strong tower. By that standard the railroad has taken other people's property in invitum and laid its iron rail from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean. No man could properly have asked the question when this land was taken, "Is this fair remuneration?" Remuneration was not the thing. Justice was. Why the desire to substitute a new dress for an old uniform which all eyes recognize and know? Who would like to see the State coat of arms or national standard changed? The dreams and the deeds of years close around and fasten upon the things that they are. So with our jurisprudence, and so with the bed-rock principles and expressions that underlie it and upon which systems of law and equity and of conscience have been builded.

Mr. President, I turn to the case of the San Diego Land Company v. National City. It is reported in 174 United States Reports, 750. It destroys some of the overweening conceptions of what is meant by due process of law, but it hews to the line, in my judgment, as to what substantially is due process of law. Let me state the case.

Under an act of the California legislature it was the official duty of the board of supervisors, town council, board of aldermen, or other legislative bodies of any city, county, or town to fix water rates. National City, in California, by its governing body proceeded to fix water rates. They were assailed as a taking of property without just compensation, and therefore a deprivation of property without due process of law. The rates were sustained and the bill dismissed.

The grounds of dismissal are instructive. It was insisted that the State constitution and laws authorized rates to be established without notice to the corporation or person immediately interested in the matter and without hearing in any form, and therefore they were repugnant to that clause of the Federal Constitution which declares that no State shall deprive any person of property without due process of law.

When the case went to the Supreme Court Judge Harlan expressed himself fully upon the question of notice. It was a loose order of hearing. It was no such order of hearing as we will have before the Interstate Commerce Commission with lawyers on each side; no such set and precise way of hearing testimony as there; but, nevertheless, the notice and the hearing were all held to be sufficient. As to the meetings of the council that fixed the water rates, the judge said:

These meetings are public and not secret. The time and place for holding them are fixed by law.

There is no ground to say that the appellant did not in fact have or was denied an opportunity to be heard upon the question of rates.

Next Judge Harlan strikes a key to which our ears should attend.

It was equally clear—

He says—

that this power could not be exercised arbitrarily and without reference to what was just and reasonable as between the public and those who appropriated the water and supplied it for general use, for the State can not by any of its agencies, legislative, executive, or judicial, withhold from the owners of private property just compensation for its use. That would be a deprivation of property without due process of law.

The same principles which are thus so clearly expressed in objection to laying down an arbitrary rule as to the exercise of process which is recognized to be one which has a right to be established in court are also applicable to the stretching forth of the Congressional hand to deny the writ of injunction in a proper case, made to the satisfaction of a court in ascertaining what is due process and in guarding the property while the process is moving. It shows the differentiation of the question now before this body in saying whether or not we shall embody the inhibition of interlocutory injunction, from the broader and general question as to whether or not we can in the architecture of courts say what jurisdiction we shall give or take away from them. We are complete masters in the latter case. But when we have set judicial process in motion and are providing it, we can not arbitrarily take away a part of that general process which has grown up as a system of law applicable to the case and leave the person who invokes the aid of equity to find a one-armed and maimed judge instead of one who has two hands to relieve him.

RATES MUST BE PALPABLY CONFISCATORY TO BE SET ASIDE.

The court points out, as it has done in some of the previous citations, what are the limitations upon itself.

But it should also be remembered that the judiciary ought not to interfere with the collection of rates established under legislative sanction unless they are so plainly and palpably unreasonable as to make their enforcement equivalent to the taking of property for public use without such compensation as under all the circumstances is just to both the owner and the public—that is, judicial interference should never occur unless the case presents clearly and beyond all doubt such a flagrant attack upon the rights of property under the guise of regulations as to compel the court to say that the rates prescribed will necessarily have the effect to deny just compensation for private property taken for the public use. (Chicago and Grand Trunk Rwy. v. Wellman, 143 U. S., 339, 344; Reagan v. Farmers' Loan and Trust Co., 154 U. S., 362, 399; Smyth v. Ames, above cited. See also Henderson Bridge Co. v. Henderson City, 173 U. S., 592, 614, 615.)

In view of these principles, can it be said that the rates in question are so unreasonable as to call for judicial interference in behalf of the appellant?

In the residue of this opinion are most thoughtful suggestions as to various matters which may be considered in making a rate. I regard the opinion as so instructive, so correct in its differentiations, that I give it still more fully:

AS TO NOTICE AND HEARING ON THE FIXING OF RATES.

On this point Judge Harlan said (174 U. S., 752):

Was the appellant entitled to formal notice as to the precise day upon which the water rates would be fixed by ordinance? We think not. The constitution itself was notice of the fact that ordinances or resolutions fixing rates would be passed annually in the month of February in each year, and would take effect on the 1st day of July thereafter. It was made by statute the duty of the appellee, at least thirty days prior to the 15th of January in each year, to obtain from the appellant a detailed statement, showing the names of the water-rate payers, the amount paid by each during the preceding year, and "all revenue derived from all sources," and the "expenditures made for supplying water during said time." It was the right and duty of the appellant in January of each year to make a detailed statement, under oath, showing every fact necessary to a proper conclusion as to the rates that should be allowed by ordinance. (Act of March 7, 1881, sec. 2, above cited.) Provision was thus made for a hearing in an appropriate way. The defendant's board could not have refused to receive the statement referred to in the statute, or to have duly considered it and given it proper weight in determining rates. If the State, by its constitution or laws, had forbidden the city or its board to receive and consider any statement or showing made by the appellant touching the subject of rates, a different question would have arisen. But no such case is now presented. In Kentucky Railroad Tax cases (115 U. S., 321, 333) it was said: "This return by the corporation through its officers is the statement of its own case, in all the particulars that enter into the question of the value of its taxable property, and may be verified and fortified by such explanations and proofs as it may seem fit to insert. It is laid by the auditor of public accounts before the board of railroad commissioners, and constitutes the matter on which they are to act. They are required to meet for that purpose on the 1st day of September of each year, at the office of the auditor at the seat of government. * * * These meetings are public, and not secret. The time and place for holding them are fixed by law."

There is no ground to say that the appellant did not in fact have or was denied an opportunity to be heard upon the question of rates. On the contrary, it appears in evidence that the subject of rates was considered in conferences between the local authorities and the officers of the appellant. Those officers may not have been present at the final meeting of the city board when the ordinance complained of was passed. They were not entitled, of right, to be present at that particular meeting. They were heard, and there is nothing to justify the conclusion that the case of the appellant was not fully considered before the ordinance was passed.

That it was competent for the State of California to declare that the use of all water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution should be a public use and subject to public regulation and control, and that it could confer upon the proper municipal corporation power to fix rates of compensation to be collected for the use of water supplied to any city, county, or town, or to the inhabitants thereof, is not disputed, and it is not, as we think, to be doubted.

MISCONCEPTIONS POINTED OUT AS TO THE NECESSITY OF RATES PAYING OPERATING EXPENSES AND DIVIDENDS IN ALL CASES—PUBLIC CONSIDERATIONS ARE PRIMARY.

The court then comments on some misconceptions, which can not be too firmly expressed. Judge Harlan said:

What elements are involved in the general inquiry as to the reasonableness of rates established by law for the use of property by the public? This question received much consideration in Smythe v. Ames, above cited. That is, it is true, related to rates established by a statute of Nebraska for railroad companies doing business in that State. But the principles involved in such a case are applicable to the present case. It was there contended that a railroad company was entitled to exact charges for transportation as would enable it at all times not only to pay operating expenses, but to meet the interest regularly accruing upon all its outstanding obligations and justify a dividend upon all its stock; and that to prohibit it from maintaining rates or charges for transportation adequate to all those ends would be a deprivation of property without due process of law and a denial of the equal protection of the laws.

After observing that this broad proposition involved a misconception of the relations between the public and a railroad corporation, that such a corporation was created for public purposes and performed a function of the State, and that its right to exercise the power of eminent domain and to charge tolls was given primarily for the benefit of the public, this court said: "It can not, therefore, be admitted that a railroad corporation maintaining a highway under the authority of the State may fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests and ignore the rights of the public." Then he points out that the fair value of property must be considered.

"But the rights of the public would be ignored if rates for the transportation of persons or property on a railroad are exacted without reference to the fair value of the property used for the public or the fair value of the services rendered, but in order simply that the corporation may meet operating expenses, pay interest on its obligations, and declare a dividend to stockholders." He then shows that fictitious values must not weigh. "If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization; and the apparent value of the property and franchises used by the corporation, as represented by its stocks, bonds, and obligations, is not alone to be considered when determining the rates that may be reasonably charged." (169 U. S., 544.) In the same case it was said: "The basis of all calculation as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a highway under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property used by it for the convenience of the public." He then notes some of the elements of value: "And in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the amount and market value of its bonds and stock, the present as compared with the original cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. We do not say that there may not be other matters to be regarded in estimating the value of the property. What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth." (169 U. S., 466, 546.) He finally concludes that justice to all parties must be subserved.

"This court had previously held in Covington and Lexington Turnpike Road Company v. Sandford (164 U. S. 578, 597, 598)—which case involved the reasonableness of rates established by legislative enactment for a turnpike company—that a corporation performing public services was not entitled, as a right, to realize a given per cent upon its capital stock; that stockholders were not the only persons whose rights or interests were to be considered, and that the rights of the public were not to be ignored. The court in that case further said: 'Each case must depend upon its special facts, and when a court, without assuming itself to prescribe rates, is required to determine whether the rates prescribed by the legislature for a corporation controlling a public highway are, as an entirety, so unjust as to destroy the value of its property for all the purposes for which it was acquired, its duty is to take into consideration the interests both of the public and the owner of the property, together with all other circumstances that are fairly to be considered in determining whether the legislature has, under the guise of regulating rates, exceeded its constitutional authority, and practically deprived the owner of the property without due process of law. * * * The utmost that any corporation operating a public highway can rightfully demand at the hands of the legislature, when exerting its general powers is that it receives what under all circumstances is such compensation for the use of its property as will be just both to it and will be just to the public.

"These principles are recognized in recent decisions of the supreme court of California. (San Diego Water Company v. San Diego (1891), 118 California, 556; Redland's Domestic Water Company v. Redlands (1898), 53 Pac. Rep. 843, 844.)

REAL VALUES HE INSISTS SHALL BE CONSIDERED.

"The contention of the appellant in the present case is that in ascertaining what are just rates the court should take into consideration the cost of its plant; the cost per annum of operating the plant, including interest paid on money borrowed and reasonably necessary to be used in constructing the same; the annual depreciation of the plant from natural causes resulting from its use, and a fair profit to the company over and above such charges for its services in supplying the water to consumers, either by way of interest on the money it has expended for the public use, or upon some other fair and equitable basis. Undoubtedly all these matters ought to be taken into consideration and such weight be given them when rates are being fixed as under all the circumstances will be just to the company and to the public. The basis of calculation suggested by the appellant is, however, defective in not requiring the real value of the property and the fair value in themselves of the services rendered to be taken into consideration. What the company is entitled to demand in order that it may have just compensation is a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public. The property may have cost more than it ought to have cost, and its outstanding bonds for money borrowed and which went into the plant may be in excess of the real value of the property. So that it can not be said that the amount of such bonds should in every case control the question of rates, although it may be an element in the inquiry as to what is, all the circumstances considered, just to both the company and the public." (174 U. S., 752–758.)

This opinion shows, in answer to some of the arguments that have been made, that it is not the constitutional right of any common carrier or of any public service corporation to require that a rate be so fixed that it shall derive a profit. It declares that the carrier has no right to fix the rate with entire regard to itself. Let it speak for itself. It shows furthermore that the public interest——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I may have to read the whole case to him before I get through.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. DANIEL. It shows that the public interest is itself an element to be considered and calculated in making the rate, and that neither the carrier nor any commission has a right to disregard that element in the compensation or the quid pro quo for services. Now I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Virginia to say that the carrier had no right in making rates to take into consideration the element of profit.

Mr. DANIEL. No; I did not say that.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator said something which seemed to me like that.

Mr. DANIEL. It was like that. Nullus similis est idem. Like is not the same.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia is what he means by "profit." Does the Senator mean that the carrier shall not be permitted to pay dividends?

Mr. DANIEL. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. Or to pay interest upon its bonds?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. They are permitted, then, to earn sufficient money, through the rates fixed, to pay their fixed charges——

Mr. DANIEL. I refer the Senator to the reports of the New York Stock Exchange. He will see the carriers are doing it every day.

Mr. ALDRICH. No.

Mr. DANIEL. Nearly every day, including dividends upon much watered stock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator permit me to finish my question?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Without undertaking to say whether the stock is watered or not, the railroad, I think, has the right to collect rates that will provide for the payment of running expenses, fixed charges, interest upon bonds, and a reasonable dividend upon its stock.

Mr. DANIEL. That depends. If the railroad chooses to give to its president a salary of a hundred thousand dollars, or an extortionate price for his services, a court will look at that and see to it that the expenditures are reasonable and not extortionate.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably. I do not think that proposition has ever been disputed.

Mr. DANIEL. Therefore it is not the right of a railroad company, regardless of its expenses, operative or for salaries, to demand a profit that will pay dividends without considering the public interest in it and making them subordinate to that public whose creature it is.

Mr. ALDRICH. Unquestionably. I think there is no contention at all upon the other side of that proposition.

Mr. DANIEL. Then there is nothing——

Mr. ALDRICH. Supposing all those things are done——

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator can not raise a controversy with me if there is no such contention.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not trying to raise a controversy with the Senator at all. I am only trying to recall to his attention the fact that a reasonable rate, based upon the payments which I suggested, would be the kind of a rate that the Commission must fix and which the court would uphold; and that a rate less than that——

Mr. DANIEL. Less than what?

Mr. ALDRICH. Less than the rate I have just defined.

Mr. DANIEL. May I ask what is the Senator's definition?

Mr. ALDRICH. A rate which would permit the railroad company to pay its running expenses, its fixed charges, interest upon its bonds being included in fixed charges, and a reasonable dividend upon its stock. Supposing in all these cases that the payments are reasonable and proper, made within the exercise of a wide discretion, I say that rates fixed upon that condition are just and reasonable rates, and rates that do not permit those payments would be unjust and unreasonable rates and would not afford just compensation for services rendered and would therefore have to be set aside by the court.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. I think the Senator from Virginia is the first Senator who has struck the keynote of what in its last analysis has got to be the basis upon which a rate is fixed—a rate that is fair alike to the shipper and the carrier. If the Senator will pardon me, I will make the request that at this time he read that decision. I think it would be well if he would do so.

Mr. ALDRICH. I agree perfectly with the Senator from Minnesota in regard to this matter, and I think there is no one here contending for any rate to be adopted by anybody which is not fair both to the public and to the carrier. I think that is one of the things to which every man in the Senate will agree.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator from Virginia will pardon me further——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. The speech made here last week by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] I think proceeded entirely upon the theory that the rate must be one that would yield a fair return upon the present value of the property, entirely ignoring the right of the shipper in a relative position to the carrier. If the Senator from Virginia will analyze that decision, I think it will go far toward clearing up a misapprehension on that point.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield further to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the absence of the Senator from Arkansas, I will say that I have no doubt if he were present he would disclaim any suggestion that he was ignoring the rights of the public or of the shipper in his contentions in regard to rates.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, a man can not, by a mere categorical answer to this question or that, dispose of a question on which the mind must bring to focus the multiform considerations which must be held in view in making a rate. In the case in which I have put in the whole residue of the opinion, or nearly the whole, which I feel it would be a trespass upon my colleagues to read in full, the Senator from Rhode Island and others will find their questions answered.

But basic to the opinion is this declaration, the public interest and the value of the property, which is at the base of the use, are the things primarily to be considered, and I happen to hold in my hand at this moment numerous other points which are to be considered in bringing before human judgment the matters and things out of which the justice of a rate is to be constructed. Mr. Snyder, in a small book which embodies notes on the interstate-commerce act, has given this list of things:

Amount of through and local business; bonded debt; bulk; character of commodity; comparison of rates.

A thing some want to leave out, but it is most material.

Competition.

My own observation about competition is that some is wise, and some is exceedingly meretricious, deceitful, and so designed as necessarily to injure.

Consequence of rate changes; cost of production; cost of service; cost of local business; distance; dividend on capital stock.

Certainly these things are to be considered, but you can not charge more for your property than it is worth in order to do anything.

Empty cars.

That is a casual consideration. It is obliged to enter. Sometimes you can put a train halfway across the continent and bring the cars back full. Sometimes the course of trade is such that you have to bring them back empty. This is often the case with the great coal trade that moves from our mountains down to the seaboard, and the conditions in this regard are of course considerations that address themselves to the minds of justice.

Fixed charges.

Your fixed charges, operating expenses, of course are to be considered; but you must consider them first, if you be the carrier, and must see to it that they are held within reasonable bounds, because if you put your salaries too high or misspend your money you can not rob Peter to pay Paul.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is the Senator willing to concede that the court must take all these things into consideration in determining whether a rate affords just compensation?

Mr. DANIEL. I do not care to do so many immaterial things. My concession on the subject is not a factor in this case. I am only showing what courts have considered, and I concede that they have considered them. What a court is going to do in the future one must judge by the past. My concession or the Senator's concession, however intelligent it might be, is not a matter that should at all worry the Senate in the consideration of this matter.

Operating expenses; other articles consumed; population along the line; proportion to local traffic; relative reasonableness of rates; relative amount of through and local business; return loads; revenue; rates prima facie; risk; special train service; storage capacity; unsettling of rates; use to the public; value of freight; volume of business; weight.

Do not forget, but hold ever in mind, that the railroad is a public highway ordained and dedicated by the State and the nation to public use. When the Senator on yesterday asked me something about a private corporation which is doing a mere corporate business he compared to this subject a matter which has no more relation to it than has the conduct of a citizen in his own home, which is his castle, compared to the Capitol of the United States dedicated by the nation to public use.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DANIEL. I will yield.

Mr. ALDRICH. I made the observation which I did because the Senator was basing the right of the United States to fix rates not upon the ground that they were public corporations doing a public business, but that they were corporations and creatures of the State or of the United States, and therefore that the creator could do these things. I called his attention to the fact that he was stating that proposition so broadly that it might include private corporations, and not for the purpose of contesting the right of Congress to fix rates for a corporation doing a public business.

THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION MUST EXERCISE THE FACULTIES OF JUDGMENT AND DISCRETION IN PASSING ON FACTS.

Mr. DANIEL. Now, Mr. President, another thing I wish to show, and then I have done. In the exercise of its duties to fix a rate, the Interstate Commerce Commission must exercise its own individual judgment and discretion. The standard of that independent judgment and discretion never has been in all civilization put into the form of a mathematical equation. The human mind never existed that could take all the considerations that are worthy of reflection in going to make up the composite thing of human judgment, label one of them 2 per cent, and another 3 per cent, and another 10 per cent. "What is truth?" asked the jesting Pilate, and turned away, not waiting for an answer. What is judgment? It is a certain attribute of the human mind indefinable by any words in which we would attempt to put our idea and concept of it. And what is justice? A thing of conscience, a thing of intelligence, a thing of desire to do the right thing. But no standard ever has bottled up judgment into a mathematical equation, and it is vain for man to attempt to take a bond of fate and reduce to exact science those things which belong to the speculations of the human intellect and to the throbs of the human heart and the movements of the nerves in man's body.

But let it be understood that the Interstate Commerce Commission, as well as a court, must have power to exercise the faculties of the human understanding, matured into its own independent and conscionable judgment, and to put that judgment into the equation of rates which they fix for the people of this country.

Now, Mr. President, on this line I am going to read, or at least analyze, some of the cases in which it is shown clearly, as I conceive it, that this country is obliged to execute the powers of Congress by delegations of power to its subordinate instruments. The distinguished Senator from Texas, who sits
